When I saw published in Southern newspapers last fall letter after letter from our friends who sit on the other side of this Chamber pledging their support to a yellow-fever appropriation and pledging their support to any measure we of the South might agree upon for our protection against yellow fever, I was impressed with the greatness and the generosity of the American heart. I was also impressed with the living, glorious fact that in time of emergency, in time of peril, and in time of need there is no sectionalism in this great country, but that each and all of us are Americans. I regret inexpressibly that all my colleagues on this side of the Chamber are not lined up in solid support of this bill, and yet, despite the objections that are here made to its passage, objections I doubt not that are founded in high conceptions of duty and patriotism, I none the less believe that the great majority of the people of the South who have given serious thought to the necessity for it, earnestly desire its passage, and that they are grateful beyond expression to our friends upon the other side for the generous support they are giving it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] such time as he may desire, not exceeding one hour.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY] said there might be some animosity on the part of Texas against other States because of the litigation between Louisiana and Texas. Let me say to this House that Texas is too broad and generous to entertain animosity against any State in this Union. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a dispatch from Jackson, Miss., to be read by the Clerk, Jackson being the capital of that State.

The Clerk read as follows:

JACKSON, MISS., March 29, 1906.

The house appropriation committee has agreed to unfavorably report the appropriation bill for the State board of health. This is the surprise of the session, and has aroused the keenest interest in both branches of the lawmaking body.

The report of the committee does not allow the health board a penny, not even allowing the usual support fund, and cutting out the $75,000 emergency fund for quarantine purposes for the next two years.

The only explanation offered for the action is that Mississippi does not care for any more quarantines.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the legislature of the State of Mississippi has failed to appropriate money for health and quarantine laws. May not that be the foreshadowing of a policy of that State and some others of the South to shift the burden and expense of quarantine laws upon the Treasury of the Federal Government? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr.

BRANTLEY] consumed twenty minutes discussing the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. That is a plain provision of the Constitution, and if any gentleman here doubts it, I assume he has not read the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, it is firmly believed that section 7 of this bill annuls every inspection law of the States of the Union; that the quarantine stations of the various States must come down; that they can not longer charge an inspection fee when ships pass from the ports of one State to another.

Section 7 destroys the police powers of the State and nullifies them. No gentleman doubts that Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce, but disease, contagion, and pestilence are not commerce. From the language of that great jurist, Chief Justice Taney, who adorned the Supreme bench for so long, let me read:

> It must be remembered that disease, pestilence, and pauperism are not subjects of commerce, although sometimes among its attendant evils. They are not things to be regulated or trafficked in, but to be prevented as far as human foresight and human means can guard against them.

We do not question the plenary power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. That power comes from the express grant given by the people of this country when the Constitution was adopted. It is undeniable that the people of the various States reserved to themselves and the respective States their police powers to guard the health, the morals, and the welfare of the people of the States of this Union.

Mr. Speaker, the police power comes not from the Constitution of the United States. It comes from the inherent sovereignty of the States of the Union. The power to regulate commerce comes from the express grant by the States when the Government was formed. The distinguished leader of the minority [Mr. WILLIAMS] said this measure was in the interest of women and children of two-thirds of the South. Let me remind him that for one hundred and seven years, under quarantine laws enacted by the Federal Government, strictly within its authority, the people of the South—the people of his State and all Southern States—have coped with all sorts of disease and contagion, and have protected themselves with their own local laws emanating from their police powers. Ah, but they say, "We have had yellow fever, and there is some animus on the part of Texas." There is no animus here or there. Let me remind him that last year when contagion was sweeping New Orleans, and practically every parish in the State of Louisiana, not one case got across the borders of Texas into our State against our quarantine laws. We administer humane quarantine regulations.

Let me analyze section 7 of this bill. It nullifies the police power of the States. It renders the State helpless to pass health and quarantine laws. It strikes down the inspection laws, and means tearing down the quarantine stations of every State. It uproots and overrides all local health, inspection, and quarantine laws, making them subordinate to the Federal power. Heretofore Federal health laws have been in "cooperation and aid" of State laws. This is a reversal of the policy, and now the local State laws must be strictly subordinate and subservient to the General Government. Until this modern doctrine now proposed by this bill it has been believed and accepted by the people and the courts that the police power of the States was an inalienable right bottomed upon inherent sovereignty, remaining with and retained by the States when the Constitution was adopted. The doctrine can not be better stated than to quote from the report recently made by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives touching the question of insurance not being commerce. That committee, through its able and distinguished chairman, said:

> The two great questions decided by the Supreme Court at present of great interest have never been shaken or weakened by the Supreme Court in any subsequent case—that insurance is not commerce; that Congress can not impair the police power of the States.

Again he said:

> The people and the States gave the Federal Government all the powers it enjoys, reserving by the Constitution to the States or to the people all powers not delegated to the United States. Power to regulate interstate commerce was given to Congress, while the police power was expressly retained by and reserved to the States. And, as so aptly and repeatedly said by the Supreme Court: "That which belongs to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States, but that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State."

Then, in strong language, he adds:

> Let it be said kindly and not offensively that it is a monstrous doctrine, subversive of our dual system of government, to even suggest, after the distribution of these great powers between the Federal Government and the States, that the Federal Government, created by the States, can take from the States the power they have always enjoyed and expressly reserved to them by the Constitution exclusive in the States. Hamilton himself never made such a claim.

There had been a clamor from all over the country for Congress to regulate insurance. But when the Judiciary Committee made this unanimous report to Congress announcing that insurance is not commerce the whole country readily and cheerfully accepted it.

What is section 7? The proponents of the bill have changed it time after time, and after about the third or fourth effort bring it in containing this language:

> That every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into a State wherein delivery or debarkation may be lawful, all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and every person interfering with or obstructing such carrier or any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any such carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to debark or unload freight in any locality contrary to the lawful regulations thereof.

In my judgment, this section undoubtedly repeals the health, quarantine, and inspection laws of every Southern State. It can not be disputed that it authorizes and compels an interstate ship, vessel, passenger or freight train, after it receives a discharge and certificate from the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, to cross State lines and pass through the States against the interference or obstruction of State health or quarantine laws or inspection officers. If State authorities stop them, investigate them, or detain them to collect a fee for inspection services under this act, or for any other purpose, they are guilty of a crime and must be drawn up in a Federal court for trial. The ship or train may be laden and reeking with contagion, disease, and plague developed after receipt of the health certificate from the Federal officer, yet the State health officers remain powerless to "obstruct" or "interfere" with it in any way. Such is the plain language of the bill. I reiterate—and measure my words when I do—that section 7 abrogates and nullifies State health and quarantine laws as against any and all kinds of interstate commerce, even if such commerce be accompanied with disease and contagion. Congress has no constitutional power to pass such an act. For a century the Supreme Court has held to the contrary. The line between commerce and the police power has been drawn by the court in no uncertain language, and in an irresistible stream of decisions the court has held that Congress can not invade or impair the police power; that it is inalienable and remains with the States as an inherent and exclusive jurisdiction. Chief Justice Fuller said, in the case of Leisey v. Hardin:

> The power to pass laws in respect to internal commerce, inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws, and laws in relation to bridges, ferries, and highways belongs to the class of powers pertaining to locality, essential to local intercommunication, to the progress and development of local prosperity, and to the protection, the safety, and welfare of society, originally necessarily belonging to, and upon the adoption of the Constitution reserved by, the States, except so far as falling within the scope of a power confided to the General Government.

In the same case Mr. Justice Gray said:

> This power, being essential to the maintenance of the authority of local government and to the safety and welfare of the people, is inalienable. As was said by Chief Justice Waite, referring to earlier decisions to the same effect, "No legislature can bargain away the public health or the public morals. The people can not do it, much less their servants. The supervision of both these subjects of governmental power is continuing in its nature, and they are to be dealt with as the special exigencies of the moment may require. Government is organized with a view to their preservation and can not divest itself of the power to provide for them. For this purpose the largest legislative discretion is allowed and the discretion can not be parted with any more than the power itself."

Indeed, this is but the bringing forward and reaffirming the doctrine announced by that great Chief Justice, John Marshall, who, in 1824, in the fire of his federalizing genius first construed the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. In convincing language he said:

> But the inspection laws are said to be regulations of commerce, and are certainly recognized in the Constitution as being passed in the exercise of a power remaining with the States. That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce will not be denied, but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived can not be admitted. The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country; to fit them for exportation, or, it may be, for domestic use. They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce, or of commerce among the States, and prepare it for that purpose. They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, etc., are component parts of this mass.

Mr. Justice Johnson restated the same proposition in the same case:

> It is no objection to the existence of distinct substantive powers that, in their application, they bear upon the same subject. The same bale of goods, the same cask of provisions, or the same ship that may be the subject of commercial regulation may also be the vehicle of disease. And the health laws that require them to be stopped and ventilated are no more intended as regulations than the laws which permit their importation are intended to inoculate the community with disease. Their different purposes mark the distinction between the powers brought into action and, while frankly exercised, they can produce no serious collision.

Let us illustrate the practical workings of this section. An interstate train may start from the city of New Orleans loaded with passengers, not one of them having a case of yellow fever; but before it reaches the borders of Texas there are several cases of yellow fever on the train. By the terms of this section the State of Texas is powerless to interfere either by its quarantine officers or through any individual to obstruct that train at the border or as it goes through Texas. Yea, further than that, the section provides that interstate passengers and freight can not be debarked in a State contrary to local regulations. By the very act of assuming to prevent debarkation of passengers the power is undeniably implied by Congress that it may permit debarkation whenever it chooses. The power to deny it is an absolute assumption of the right to do it whenever Congress sees fit. It is a specific denial of the rights of the States to prevent it whenever Congress chooses to interdict State authority. It unerringly follows that if Congress can follow passengers or commerce through a State against her local laws, it can, whenever it desires, permit their debarkation. It is an assumption of Congressional power over interstate commerce whether it bears disease or not. If Congress can override State quarantine laws in part, enacted for the purpose of preventing disease, it can utterly eradicate them in their whole vigor. This proposition can not be successfully disputed. The doctrine is worse than monstrous, for if Congress can do this, it can forbid the States to defend the lives and health of their people against disease and death under any and all circumstances whenever transportation, interstate passengers, and freight are involved.

Permit me here to quote some principles of law that have not been shaken in a hundred years. They have been affirmed and reaffirmed down to this very moment. Mr. Chief Justice Taney said:

So also in regard to health and quarantine laws. They have been continually passed by the States ever since the adoption of the Constitution, and the power to pass them recognized by acts of Congress, and the revenue officers of the General Government directed to assist in their execution. Yet all of these health and quarantine laws are necessarily, in some degree, regulations of foreign commerce in the ports and harbors of the State. They subject the ship and cargo and crew to the inspection of a health officer appointed by the State; they prevent the crew and cargo from landing until the inspection is made, and destroy the cargo if deemed dangerous to health. And during all this time the vessel is detained at the place selected for the quarantine ground by the State authority. The expenses of these precautionary measures are also usually, and I believe universally, charged upon the master, the owner, or the ship, and the amount regulated by the State law and not by Congress. Now, so far as these laws interfere with shipping, navigation, or foreign commerce, or impose burdens upon either of them, they are unquestionably regulations of commerce. Yet, as I have already said, the power has been continually exercised by the States, has been continually recognized by Congress ever since the adoption of the Constitution, and constantly affirmed and supported by this court whenever the subject came before it.

Mr. Justice MacLean said:

The acknowledged police power of a State extends often to the destruction of property. A nuisance may be abated. Everything prejudicial to the health or morals of a city may be removed. Merchandise from a port where a contagious disease prevails, being liable to communicate the disease, may be excluded; and, in extreme cases, it may be thrown into the sea. This comes in direct conflict with the regulation of commerce, and yet no one doubts the local power. It is a power essential to self-preservation, and exists, necessarily, in every organized community. It is, indeed, the law of nature, and is possessed by man in his individual capacity. He may resist that which does him harm, whether he be assailed by an assassin or approached by poison. And it is the settled construction of every regulation of commerce that, under the sanction of its general laws, no person can introduce into a community malignant diseases or anything which contaminates its morals or endangers its safety. And this is an acknowledged principle applicable to all general regulations. Individuals in the enjoyment of their own rights must be careful not to injure the rights of others.

And that great jurist, Mr. Justice Catron, said:

The assumption is that the police power was not touched by the Constitution, but left to the States as the Constitution found it. This is admitted; and whenever a thing, from character or condition, is of a description to be regulated by that power in the State, then the regulation may be made by the State and Congress can not interfere. But this must always depend on facts subject to legal ascertainment, so that the injured may have redress, and the fact must find its support in this, whether the prohibited article belongs to, and is subject to be regulated as part of, foreign commerce or of commerce among the States. If, from its nature, it does not belong to commerce, or if its condition, from putrescence or other cause, is such when it is about to enter the State that it no longer belongs to commerce, or, in other words, is not a commercial article, then the State power may exclude its introduction. And as an incident to this power, a State may use means to ascertain the fact. And here is the limit between the sovereign power of the State and the Federal power. That is to say, that which does not belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the police power of the State; and that which does belong to commerce is within the jurisdiction of the United States.

And from that keen and luminous intellect of Mr. Justice Grier we have the following vigorous logic:

It has been frequently decided by this court "that the powers which relate to merely municipal regulations, or what may more properly be called internal police, are not surrendered by the States, or restrained by the Constitution of the United States; and that consequently, in relation to these, the authority of a State is complete, unqualified, and conclusive." Without attempting to define what are the peculiar subjects or limits of this power, it may safely be affirmed that every law for the restraint and punishment of crime, for the preservation of the public peace, health, and morals, must come within this category. * * * If the right to control these subjects be "complete, unqualified, and exclusive" in the State legislatures, no regulations of secondary importance can supersede or restrain their operations on any ground of prerogative or supremacy. * * * It is for this reason that quarantine laws, which protect the public health, compel mere commercial regulations to submit to their control. They restrain the liberty of the passengers, they operate on the ship, which is the instrument of commerce, and its officers and crew, the agents of navigation. They seize the infected cargo and cast it overboard. The soldier and the sailor, though in the service of the Government, are arrested, imprisoned and punished for their offenses against society. Paupers and convicts are refused admission into the country. All these things are done, not from any power which the States assume to regulate commerce or to interfere with the regulations of Congress, but because police laws for the preservation of health, prevention of crime, and protection of public welfare, must of necessity have full and free operation, according to the exigency which requires their interference.

In pursuance of the salutary provisions of law here laid down, if this train carrying interstate commerce is laden with disease, the State of Texas has the right to detain the passengers, and we have the power under our inherent jurisdiction to burn up the train itself, to destroy it and all the freight and baggage upon it if we pay a just compensation. Under this act the State has no authority to stop the train for any purpose. This act is dealing not only with yellow fever, but it embraces all sorts of pestilence, contagious diseases, and all kinds of epidemics injurious to the people of a State. It will include cholera, smallpox, bubonic plague, and also every disease known to the stock industry of this country. This act, I say to you gentlemen from the West and Northwest, repeals your stock-inspection laws as well as the health laws of the various States. For one hundred and seven years the decisions of the Supreme Court have been uniform on one proposition, and that is that the power of Congress to regulate commerce comes from the Constitution, and the rights of the States to enact health laws were retained by the people and never surrendered to the Federal Government.

If any question is settled by the Supreme Court of the United States it is that Congress can not impair the police powers of the State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does anybody doubt that?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. They certainly do doubt it. Let me put this question to my friend: Here is a ship loaded at New Orleans bound for Galveston, Tex. The ship is compelled to take the passengers and baggage and freight to Galveston. Then the passengers, freight, and baggage are bound from Galveston, through Texas and California, to San Francisco. Section 7 forbids the quarantine officers at Galveston to detain that ship or passengers or levy any fee against it, and if they do they are subject to a penalty under this statute and must go to the Federal court. Yes; they doubt it. The gentlemen who are behind this bill must doubt the proposition of law I have announced if they are consistent. Who is better able to judge for the people of the State—the inhabitants of the State or a Federal officer located far from the seat of contagion, perhaps in Washington? Gentlemen talk about shotgun quarantine, mobs, and riots. Whenever it is undertaken to run an interstate train through a State against the police regulations and quarantine laws of that State the consequences may become direful.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to illustrate further the disastrous effects of this section upon the reserved rights of the States. A cargo of passengers and freight is placed upon a steamer at New Orleans bound for Galveston, and thence by rail through Texas, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, Idaho, and Washington, to Seattle. After the steamer is loaded and the Federal officer gives his certificate of discharge to the vessel and passengers, yellow fever, smallpox, or cholera breaks out on the same while on the voyage to Galveston. When the ship reaches Galveston it has the right under this section to go by the quarantine station at Galveston unmolested, steam into the Texas harbor, transfer its cargo of people and freight to the railway trains, and send them through the very hearts of the States mentioned to Seattle. Not one of those States can detain them or interfere with their progress. No fee can be collected at Galveston for inspection services. If the State health or quarantine officers touch this cargo of people and freight, they are amenable to section 7 and must be fined $300 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both fine and imprisonment may be inflicted.

Let me illustrate by another case, and it is not extreme. Bubonic plague breaks out in San Francisco. An interstate train takes aboard hundreds of passengers and their baggage, and train and passengers are "discharged and properly certified" under section 7. The train steams out into California on its journey across the continent, through Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, and into New York through the very density and heart of population in all those States. The health authorities of those States can not "interfere with or obstruct" such train, but must throw up their sovereign hands and salute this great vehicle of disease and pestilence. Case after case may break out on the journey, the train may become a reeking mass of disease, putridity, death, and corruption, but no State may rise in its sovereign capacity and protect the lives and health of its people against this train of death and destruction. We must bow and say that the States have surrendered this right, although the decisions of courts for a hundred years say not—that we only surrendered the naked right of regulating interstate commerce to the Federal Government and kept the sacred power to safeguard the health and welfare of our people against any kind of outside invasion or jurisdiction. This same argument may be applied with equal force of logic to the stock-quarantine laws of every State. Let me commend it to you gentlemen of the great West and Northwest, for this section 7 applies to all sorts of freight bound from one State to another. Live stock on such trains are commerce falling within its terms. Let some gentleman tell me, if an interstate train starts from Louisiana through Mississippi or Texas or Arkansas and yellow fever develops upon it, the authorities of one of those States undertake to stop it, is there any authority in this bill authorizing any kind of interference by either State? Ah, gentlemen, you have left no such power.

Mr. PUJO. Did the gentleman ask for the power?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. PUJO. Kindly turn to the last section of the last paragraph of section 7, and you can see the authority is there expressly conferred upon the local authorities, either State or municipality or local, to prevent the landing of persons or property against the local regulations.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; it says they shall not be permitted to debark. I ask where is the authority to free a train of a pestilence, whether it be yellow fever, smallpox, or bubonic plague?

Mr. PUJO. Why, that is authority that exists by operation of law because it is vested in the State, and that can not be taken away.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am glad to have made a Christian out of the gentleman from Louisiana on that question.

Mr. BOWERS. Does the gentleman deny that the very authorities he has just read declare that when that which was theretofore commerce ceases to be commerce by reason of becoming infected the power of the State authorities attaches?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do deny that there is recognition of any such authority in this bill, and the object of section 7 is to send an interstate train and passengers through a State under Federal protection, overriding those very powers of the States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I must decline to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman object to my reading part of section 7 to him?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Read that in your own time.

Ah, that is not all, Mr. Speaker. I challenge any gentleman to read the section and show me the power left with the States to touch a train carrying interstate commerce through her confines.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman just one time, as my friend is always so amiable.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, when Congress acts, as it is now about to do, I want to know if Congress has not the complete right to control commerce, and that the States can not conrol interstate commerce when Congress acts?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No, sir; not at all; and the only authorities that ever squinted that way are what lawyers call obiter dictum, and I will be perfectly candid with gentlemen, because I know they will rely on those cases. Such cases are found in 118 and 187 United States Reports. In the Reid case the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the State laws of the State of Colorado, and overruled a Federal statute and certificate even on your proposition. The court went out of its way to indulge in some obiter dicta. And to what does the obiter dictum amount? Simply nothing. If disease is commerce, so is insurance. If pestilence and contagion are commerce, so are the perfumes that are wafted to us from the orange orchards of sunny Florida. If plague and destruction are commerce, the breezes that sweep across our western prairies, invigorated with the loftiness and strength of the Rocky Mountains, are within that classification. And the great storms that lower over the angry bosom of the Gulf of Mexico and in their wild fury and rage sweep our coasts and devastate our shores must be commerce, too, within such definition. Whatever is legitimate commerce Congress has the right to regulate between States; but whenever it becomes a vehicle of disease the State has the right to meet the soldiers of the Federal Government at the seacoast, to meet her battle ships, her officers and sailors, and cast her cargo overboard if it is necessary for the protection of the health of our inhabitants. Let me read a better way to state it than I could put it. This is the language of a great lawyer, who argued the "Passenger cases." Standing before the Supreme Court, he said:

> Suppose a citizen or an alien, no matter whom, the President of the United States or the humblest individual that ever entered the harbor to approach our city, bringing infection, bearing death to thousands—an approach more terrible than that of an invading army—he is repelled, justly repelled, by the express authority of the law of nations. By whom is he repelled? By the Federal Government? Under what clause of the Constitution? Under which of its powers? Under its commerce power? A traffic in contagion! A tariff on disease! Under its war power? A war with the king of terrors? No. The State, and the State alone, has the power, and alone is charged with the duty of repelling disease and guarding its confines from the entrance of whatever may injure the citizen.

Ah, gentlemen, Alexander Hamilton in his better and palmier days never claimed such power for the Federal Government as you are advocating here to-day. No matter how others may vote, how others may look at it, representing in part more than 3,000,000 enlightened people, I shall stand here and resist you to the last extremity. We have no right as individuals or Representatives to rob the people of their sovereign functions. They have never surrendered them, and we can not do it for them.

The gentleman from Georgia alluded to the health laws of Texas and called them an embargo. They were not an embargo. Yellow fever had appeared in New Orleans last year. Texas only undertook to guard against the contagion that was dealing death and destruction to our neighbors. Our quarantine was humane. It was not an embargo. Thanks to our most capable State health officer and his noble band of assistants, not a case of yellow fever reached Texas. We freed ourselves from it. This seemed to wound our Louisiana friends, and now they seek to put this burden on surrounding States. We protest and deny the authority here. Texas people are practically unanimous against this quarantine law. Here is a telegram from the State health officer of Texas, announcing that the legislature, which happens to be in session, by a unanimous vote of the senate and house of representatives, congratulates the Senators and Representatives from that State for the stand they have taken against this pernicious measure. I ask that it be inserted in my remarks.

The telegram is as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., April 2, 1906.

Hon. R. L. HENRY, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

House concurred in Senate resolution indorsing position of Texas delegation opposing Federal control of quarantine. I find upon careful investigation sentiment of people of Texas almost unanimous against Federal control. This resolution was not hastily acted upon, but held up in Senate two days, thoroughly debated, then passed both houses unanimously.

TABOR.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will.

Mr. HEPBURN. This constitutional argument of the gentleman on the power of the States and the power of the Federal Government is certainly very interesting. I would like to ask the gentleman, however, how he differentiates between the exercise of power upon the part of the General Government in the two cases that I will suggest—the one that is now before the House and embodied in this bill, and another one to which I will call his attention. I understand the gentleman to say that the Federal Government has no power in any way to interfere with the quarantine regulations of the State of Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do.

Mr. HEPBURN. But I understand the gentleman to say that the Government has the power, and that Congress has the power, to take of the common treasure of the Government the proceeds of the sale of public lands and apply that fund, to which Texas has not contributed a dollar, to the improvement of the lands of Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, will the gentleman differentiate, if he can, between the exercise of the power in the one case and the other?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that I will not discuss that now, for it is not relevant.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want the gentleman to discuss the two questions in conjunction.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not think there is any more similarity between the two questions than there is between the mosquito theory and the grasshopper theory.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate has just passed a Federal quarantine bill which is fashioned along the right lines. The Senate, with a unanimity that is striking and patriotic, failed to include section 7 or anything like it. While others here are undertakng to enforce this doctrine under Republican rules, it is pleasing to reflect that the Senate is at least a deliberative body. [Applause.] There is no section 7 there, and it looks hopeful that it will not go in by consent of the Senate.

It is instructive to briefly review the history of Federal quarantine legislation. In 1793 yellow fever invaded New York. In 1795 it was epidemic in Philadelphia. In 1798 it again invaded New York. The Federalist party was at the height of its power. The idea of centralization in government amounted almost to madness. Yet no one proposed to go as far as this act when Congress came to enact a quarantine law. When Mr. Adams sent his recommendations to Congress he only urged that contemplated quarantine laws be "in aid of the health laws of the respective States." Then came the statutes of 1799. When they were passed they carried in their provisions that Federal officers of the United States "shall faithfully aid in the execution of such quarantine and health laws"—the State laws. The next change came in 1878, and it expressly provided that "Federal officers should cooperate with and aid State and municipal boards of health." In 1893 the act was again amended and the same language and idea carried forward in every material respect. Federal officers were still commanded to cooperate with and aid State officers. In 1902 the sundry civil bill, appropriating money to be used by the Federal Government, provided that it should be used "in aid of" State quarantine laws.

Gentlemen, for one hundred and seven years the States, in quarantine matters, have been commanding officers and the Federal officers have been their lieutenants.

Not until recent years has any other doctrine been promulgated. Up to this time it has been understood that all these laws were in aid of State laws. It is now for the first time proposed to dismiss the language "in cooperation and aid of." A new dogma has arisen, demanding that interstate commerce shall fall under exclusive Federal jurisdiction, whether it be burdened with disease and contagion or not. Such is the simple proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will for this once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Texas has two or three times made the assertion that section 7 was applicable to trains that were infected. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that section 7 in not applicable to all trains, but only to such trains used—to use the language of the bill—as may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service. In other words, such trains only as have been examined and have no infection. Later on in this clause it says "such carriers and such carriages." The State laws are not prevented by this section from taking hold of it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I anticipated the question and knew what the gentleman intended saying. The section presupposes that the trains will be discharged and examined by Federal officers. If they do not do so, and contagion breaks out, then I say that under the language of the statute the State can not stop them. It presupposes that the Federal officers will do their duty. In most cases, perhaps, they will. There is no protection either to the people of my State, where the infection has broken out after the train has started, and no refinement or reasoning can make section 7 read that way.

Mr. Speaker, while there is a great deal more I would like to say, there are others who are interested and who have the right to speak, and I shall conclude in a few moments. In concluding, let me say that from the first case of Gibbons v. Ogden, in 1824, construing the interstate-commerce clause, the line has been followed as then marked. Interstate commerce over on one can be regulated by Congress, and quarantine and health laws are on the other and can not be surrendered by the people. They abide with the States, and the power to regulate interstate commerce and to enact quarantine measures are as distinct as night from day.

Whenever Congress assumes the jurisdiction to partially paralyze the police power of a State it asserts a doctrine meaning its total annihilation. If it can touch it, the power to destroy results from the same logic. In concluding my remarks I can not refrain from quoting parts of two or three decisions evidencing how sacredly the courts have guarded this power of the States.

In the case of Patterson v. Kentucky the court said:

> By the settled doctrines of this court the police power extends, at least, to the protection of the lives, the health, and the property of the community against the injurious exercise by any citizen of his own rights. State legislation, strictly and legitimately for police purposes, does not, in the sense of the Constitution, necessarily intrench upon any authority which has been confided, expressly or by implication, to the National Government. * * * In recognition of this fundamental principle, we have frequently decided that the police power of the States was not surrendered when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States. Hence the States may by police regulations, protect their people against the introduction within their respective limits of infected merchandise. "A bale of goods upon which the duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under health laws, and if it can not be purged of its poison, may be committed to the flames." (Gilman v. Philadelphia.) So may the States, by like regulations, exclude from their midst not only convicts, paupers, idiots, lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, but animals having contagious diseases. (Railroad Co. v. Husen.)
> This court has never hesitated, by the most rigid rules of construction, to guard the commercial power of Congress against encroachment in the form or under the guise of State regulation, established for the purpose and with the effect of destroying or impairing rights secured by the Constitution. It has, nevertheless, with marked distinctness and uniformity, recognized the necessity, growing out of the fundamental conditions of civil society, of upholding State police regulations which were enacted in good faith and had appropriate and direct connection with that protection to life, health, and property which each State owes to her citizens.

In the case In re Rahrer, as late as 1900, Chief Justice Fuller said:

> The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States not surrendered by them to the General Government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive. * * * In short, it is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remains with the individual States, and can not be assumed by the National Government, and that in this respect it is not interfered with by the fourteenth amendment.

This principle is reaffirmed in the Sugar Trust case, in 156 United States Reports, and in the Coffee case, from New York, in 192 United States Reports. So it has been reiterated down to this very moment.

Mr. Speaker, in 1865, before the roar of cannon had died away from the desolation and gloom of many bloody fields of carnage, to be succeeded by that black night of reconstruction, when it was supposed that State sovereignty had gone out forever in the smoke of battle, the Supreme Court declared that the police powers of the States had not died too. Read the case of Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wallace, and such powers stand out in bold relief, undiminished by the shock of that terrific contest. It must be admitted, however, that there is an unhealthy sentiment in some quarters to dwarf those inalienable rights and unduly stretch the jurisdiction of Congress. As for me, I shall not deny to this Government by my voice any proper constitutional grant; but the proudest moment of my life shall be when I vote to stay iconoclastic hands by my effort to transmit unimpaired to future generations the integrity, rights, and sovereignty of the States as our fathers bequeathed them to us. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted to me I desire in the outset to call attention to a few facts in connection with the outbreaks of yellow fever that have ravaged this country since the disease was first introduced into North America. It appeared for the first time in 1668, when it was introduced into the city of New York from the West Indies, and since that time there have been 143 separate introductions of the infection from foreign shores, a great part of which, 78 in all, have become epidemic and spread from one portion of the country to the other.

The first year for which any figures as to its mortality are available is 1699, which is also the first year in which it reached the epidemic stage, and 220 people are known to have died of it in Philadelphia out of a population of two to three thousand. It was brought in a ship from Barbados, and at that time was known as "Barbados fever."

In 1702 it was again brought to New York from St. Thomas, and a most severe epidemic raged. Five hundred and seventy deaths are known to have occurred in that city. It was carried as far south along the lines of travel as Biloxi, Miss. This was the first year in which it appeared south of Charleston, and the spread from the initial focus at New York was general.

The next known epidemic was 1732, when 8 to 10 deaths daily occurred in Charleston, and 250 all told in Philadelphia.

In the first hundred years of its history there were thirty-four outbreaks in all, ten of which were epidemic. Only partial figures are available, and only for seven years during this period, which show 2,806 deaths.

Its first appearance from abroad on the South Atlantic coast was at Charleston in 1693, and on the Gulf coast in 1702. It did not reach New Orleans until 1769, one hundred and one years after its first introduction into New York, and it did not reach the epidemic stage in New Orleans until 1793. In this year it extended from Portsmouth, N. H., to New Orleans; and in Philadelphia, out of a population of 55,000, there is known to have been 4,044 deaths.

In 1795 it was introduced from the West Indies into New York, raged at New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Providence, R. I., New Orleans, Charleston, Norfolk, and Baltimore, and extended generally from Boston to New Orleans, 700 deaths occurring in New York in three months out of a population of 40,000.

Up to the beginning of the nineteenth century there had been fifty-one outbreaks and, as far as incomplete figures are obtainable, 13,665 deaths from the disease. Its scope had been widespread, the States of New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Virginia, Mississippi, Alabama, Connecticut, Florida, Maryland, New Hampshire, Louisiana, Rhode Island, Delaware, and North Carolina all having been visited by the disease. One of the worst epidemics was in Nantucket in 1763, where 259 deaths occurred.

In the first twenty-five years of the nineteenth century there was an outbreak each year, and there are records of 5,641 deaths during this time. Ten of these years the fever was in the New England States. During this time the first known importation from Cuba occurred, in 1818, the disease having invariably come from the West Indies before.

Following its history from 1825 to 1893, when the records became more perfect, there were 60 outbreaks and 55,065 deaths. It reached the worst stages in the fifties, in 1853 alone there being a record of 10,475 deaths. This is the last year in which an epidemic occurred north of Virginia, though the disease has appeared and spread since that time. Up to that date it had raged about as often on the North Atlantic seaboard as on the South Atlantic and Gulf coast. Its last appearance in the far North was in New York in 1872.

The comparative freedom from epidemics during the civil war is to be noted. This was caused by blockades, and shows that the disease does not originate in the United States.

The year 1878 furnishes the first complete record of the number of cases and deaths, when there were 125,000 cases and 12,000 deaths.

Since 1893 there have been seven outbreaks, with 9,551 recorded cases and 704 deaths, not including the epidemic of 1905, for which figures are not complete, making a total of 142 outbreaks, 77 epidemics, and 75,075 recorded deaths to 1905, exclusive of that year, for which no figures have yet been compiled.

At some time or other the infection has been introduced into, and spread from, the ports of every State on the Atlantic and Gulf seaboards except the State of Maine.

The loss of life has mounted up into the hundreds of thousands. The stagnation of business and the interference with commerce have been so great as to be almost impossible of statement, and the great depreciation in values of all character, the conflicts between the health authorities of different States, and in many instances between State and municipal authorities, and the varying and conflicting regulations, have been such as to bring sharply to the attention of the people of this country the urgent and immediate need for a different and more efficient system of quarantine, and the inquiry is, How and by whom shall that quarantine be administered?

From the facts which I have stated, and from the history of the disease I deduce two propositions: First, that yellow fever is not indigenous to the United States, but is always introduced from abroad, and that both its introduction and spread are preventable; second, that because it does come from abroad as an incident to foreign commerce, and because of the fact that when it once enters it may, at least before it is discovered, stalk free and unhampered from one State to another, the question of preventing its entry, as an incident to the commerce with foreign nations, is one not only of national import and concern, but of national duty as well.

A proper presentation of this matter naturally divides itself into two parts—first, the authority of Congress to pass the pending measure, and, secondly, that being granted or demonstrated, the wisdom, advisability, and necessity of enacting the legislation. I shall devote myself to those two propositions in the order in which I have stated them.

In the outset let me say that ever since the case of McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheaton, p. 405), it has been the settled law of this country, as to conflicting State and Federal powers, that whenever two statutes, one enacted by the Congress of the United States in pursuance of a delegated power, and the other by one of the States in pursuance of one of its reserved powers, the police power if you please, conflict, the Federal law is paramount and controls. That doctrine was stated for the first time in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland in the following language:

> We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it, in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution are constitutional.

If the means selected be appropriate, its propriety, necessity, or advisability is for the determination of Congress alone.

> On this ground the counsel for the bank place its claim to be exempted from the power of a State to tax its operations. There is no express provision for the case, but the claim has been sustained on a principle which so entirely pervades the Constitution, is so intermixed with the materials which compose it, so interwoven with its web, so blended with its texture, as to be incapable of being separated from it without rending it into shreds. This great principle is that the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof are supreme; that they control the constitution and laws of the respective States, and can not be controlled by them. From this, which may be almost termed an axiom, other propositions are deduced as corollaries, on the truth or error of which, and on their application to this case, the cause has been supposed to depend. These are, first, that a power to create implies a power to preserve; second, that a power to destroy, if wielded by a different hand, is hostile to and incompatible with these powers to create and to preserve; third, that where there is repugnancy, that authority which is supreme must control, not yield to that over which it is supreme.

And was reenforced and accentuated in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton, p. 209), in the following language:

> Since, however, in exercising the power of regulating their own purely internal affairs, whether of trading or police, the States may sometimes enact laws the validity of which depends on their interfering with and being contrary to an act of Congress passed in pursuance of the Constitution, the court will enter upon the inquiry whether the laws of New York, as expounded by the highest tribunal of that State, have, in their application to this case, come into collision with an act of Congress and deprived a citizen of a right to which that act entitled him. Should this collision exist, it will be immaterial whether those laws were passed in virtue of a concurrent power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" or in virtue of a power to regulate their domestic trade and police. In one case and the other the acts of New York must yield to the law of Congress, and the decision sustaining the privilege they confer, against the right given by law of the Union, must be erroneous. This opinion has been frequently expressed in this court, and is founded as well on the nature of the Government as on the words of the Constitution. In argument, however, it has been contended that where a law passed by a State in the exercise of its acknowledged sovereignty comes into conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution, they affect the subject and each other like equal opposing powers. But the framers of our Constitution foresaw this state of things, and provided for it by declaring the supremacy not only of itself but of the laws made in pursuance of it.
> The nullity of any act inconsistent with the Constitution is produced by the declaration that the Constitution is the supreme law. The appropriate application of that part of the clause which confers the same supremacy on laws and treaties is to such acts of the State legislatures as do not transcend their powers, but though enacted in the execution of acknowledged State powers, interfere with or are contrary to the laws of Congress made in the pursuance of the Constitution or some treaty made under the authority of the United States. In every such case the act of Congress or the treaty is supreme, and the law of the State, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to it.

Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., p. 419), not only followed in the same line, but announced the supreme control of Congress over foreign commerce, as Gibbons v. Ogden had done as to the interstate commerce, and I quote as follows:

> We think, then, that the act under which the plaintiffs in error were indicted is repugnant to that article of the Constitution which declares that "no State shall lay any impost or duty on imports or exports."

tion that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress. It is not, therefore, a matter of surprise that the grant should be as extensive as the mischief and should comprehend all foreign commerce and all commerce among the States. To construe the power so as to impair its efficacy would tend to defeat an object in the attainment of which the American public took, and justly took, that strong interest which arose from a full conviction of its necessity.

These three great cases, all decided by Chief Justice Marshall, are the foundation of our jurisprudence on this subject, and upon them "hang all the law and the prophets," as to the respective rights of the State and nation as to interstate and foreign commerce. By an unbroken line of cases, without deviation or shadow of turning, without even a murmur of dissent to break the harmony of accord and the force of decision, the law has come down to us to-day as declared in that day of early construction, and I state, without fear of successful contradiction, that it is not only within the power of the Federal Government to purge the foreign commerce which it regulates, and which it alone can regulate, of the disease which may be incident to it, but that it is its plain and manifest duty to so purge it. [Applause.] I submit that it is the plain duty of the Federal Government to protect the citizens of this country against the introduction of any disease that may be incident to the commerce which is solely under its control, and as its authority over interstate commerce is the same as its control of foreign commerce, and flows from the same grant of power in the same clause of the Constitution, its duty as to interstate commerce is the same as to foreign trade.

Now, along those lines, and dealing directly with the question of quarantine, I desire to call the attention of the House to what the Supreme Court of the United States has said on that question. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who preceded me, has characterized every statement of the courts with reference to the Federal power of quarantine, as incident to the control of commerce, as dictum, and has wholly overlooked the fact that two-thirds, if not more, of the quotations read by him were arguendo, and incidental, if not foreign, to the main questions decided, and therefore, under his rule of statement of what is dicta, certainly within that category.

But I deny that the utterances of the Supreme Court in the later cases—the cases which involve specifically the question of quarantine and which I shall now read—were dicta, and shall insist that they were uttered in the decision of the very vitals of the cases in which they appear.

The first utterance on that subject—the first clear utterance—was in the case of the Morgan Steamship Company v. Louisiana (118 U. S., p. 455).

In this case the Morgan Steamship Company assailed the health laws of Louisiana as invalid, because, as charged by the steamship company, they invaded a domain which under the Constitution was committed exclusively to Congress. Two questions therefore had to be decided—first, the power of Congress, and, second, whether that power was infringed upon by the State statute; and the decision of both questions was necessary to the determination of the case.

The court, after having upheld the statute of the State—that is, after having declared that it was within the power of the State of Louisiana to enact quarantine laws for the protection of its citizens and commerce—at page 463 said:

> Is the law under consideration void as a regulation of commerce? Undoubtedly it is in some sense a regulation of commerce. It arrests a vessel on a voyage which may have been a long one. It may affect commerce among the States when the vessel is coming from some other State of the Union than Louisiana, and it may affect commerce with foreign nations when the vessel arrested comes from a foreign port. This interruption of the voyage may be for days or for weeks. It extends to the vessel, the cargo, the officers and seamen, and the passengers. In so far as it provides a rule by which this power is exercised, it can not be denied that it regulates commerce. We do not think it necessary to enter into the inquiry whether, notwithstanding this, it is to be classed among those police powers which were retained by the States as exclusively their own and therefore not ceded to Congress. For, while it may be a police power in the sense that all provisions for the health, comfort, and security of the citizens are police regulations and an exercise of the police power, it has been said more than once in this court that, even where such powers are so exercised as to come within the domain of Federal authority, as defined by the Constitution, the latter must prevail. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 1 Wheat., 210; Henderson v. The Mayor, 92 U. S., 259, 272; New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louisiana Light Co., 115 U. S., 650, 661.)
> But it may be conceded that whenever Congress shall undertake to provide for the commercial cities of the United States a general system of quarantine, or shall confine the execution of the details of such a system to a national board of health or to local boards, as may be found expedient, all State laws on the subject will be abrogated, at least so far as the two are inconsistent. But until this is done the laws of the State on the subject are valid.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWERS. My time is very brief, and I can not yield.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I just want to ask one question.

Mr. BOWERS. I have only twenty minutes, and I will need forty. I want to call attention to the fact that this "dictum," as the gentleman from Texas styles it, has been sanctified by repetition and approval by that august tribunal in every subsequent case which has come before it since its first utterance, in which quarantine or any kindred subject was involved or even remotely touched, and has been made by the Supreme Court the rock and sheet anchor of the law on that subject.

Again, the court in the same case, further says:

> But aside from this, quarantine laws belong to that class of State legislation which, whether passed with the intent of regulating commerce or not, must be admitted to have that effect and which are valid.

When and how long?

> Valid until displaced or contravened by some legislation of Congress.

Again, in the case of the French Company v. The Louisiana Board of Health (186 U. S., p. 380), another quarantine case, the court repeats Justice Miller's language in the Morgan Steamship case with approval, and further says:

> Again, in Louisiana v. Texas (176 U. S., 1, 21) the court was called upon to consider a quarantine law of the State of Texas which, by its terms, was applicable to and was enforced as to both interstate and foreign commerce. After referring approvingly to the case which we have above cited, the court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, said:
> "It is not charged that this statute is invalid nor could it be if tested by its terms. While it is true that the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the States is a power complete in itself, acknowledging no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution, and that where the action of the States in the exercise of their reserve powers comes into collision with it, the latter must give way, yet it is also true that quarantine laws belong to that class of State legislation which is valid until displaced by Congress, and that such legislation has been expressly recognized by the laws of the United States almost from the beginning of the Government."
> Further, in calling attention to the fact, as remarked by the court in Morgan Steamship Company v. Louisiana Board of Health, supra, that in the nature of things quarantine laws and laws relating to public health must necessarily vary with the different localities of the country, it was said:
> "Hence even if Congress had remained silent on the subject, it would not have followed that the exercise of the police power of the State in this regard, although necessarily operating on interstate commerce, would be therefore invalid. Although from the nature and subjects of the power regulating commerce it must be ordinarily exercised by the National Government exclusively, this has not been held to be so where in relation to the particular subject-matter different rules might be suitable in different localities. At the same time, Congress could by affirmative action displace the local laws, substitute laws of its own, and thus correct any unjustifiable and oppressive exercise of power by State legislation."

And Congress has exercised that power, Congress has displaced local laws. Congress has by the quarantine act of 1893 displaced local laws, and to a certain extent substituted Federal laws in their place. Congress has, by the animal-industry act, which it passed in 1903, in the Fifty-seventh Congress, in which the State of Texas was greatly interested and by which it greatly benefited, responding to the suggestion of the Supreme Court in the case of Reid v. Colorado (187 U. S., p. 137), to a certain extent abrogated and displaced local cattle quarantine laws, and displaced them because of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States in deciding that Reid case, declared that the Federal power could not, in the case at bar, be invoked to protect an interstate shipment of Texas cattle, only because Congress had not undertaken to assume complete and entire jurisdiction of the matter.

Now, two of the judges, Justice Brown and Justice Harlan, dissented from the opinion of the court in the case of the French Company v. the Louisiana Board of Health, supra, not because they dissented from the proposition which I have read, but because they went further on that question than the majority of the court were willing to go. I quote this from the dissent of those two great judges:

> The power of the several States in the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject—

And only in the absence of legislation on the subject, as demonstrated by the gentleman from Georgia by his references to the provisions of the Constitution itself this morning—> is to establish quarantine regulations and prohibit the introduction into the State of persons infected with disease or recently exposed to contagion, and to impose reasonable charges, etc.

But I come now, gentlemen, to a case closer to the point now at issue and under discussion than any other I have been able to find after a somewhat exhaustive study of the books, and in my humble judgment absolutely in point. I refer to Reid v. Colorado (187 U. S., p. 137). My friend from Texas says this is also dictum, but let us examine it and see if he is correct. The Reid case arose under this state of facts: Reid claimed the right, after having had his cattle inspected under the animal-industry act of 1884, to take them into the State of Colorado, in violation of a statute of that State, insisting that Congress had complete, supreme, and exclusive power over interstate commerce whenever it chose to assume jurisdiction and control, and that by the animal-industry act of 1894 it had taken entire and exclusive control, thereby ousting and annulling all State regulations which conflicted with the Federal law. Two questions were therefore, as heretofore, involved, nay, they necessarily inhered in the cause. First, the power of Congress to enact a law which would control; second, was the animal-industry act such a law; did it assume entire control and furnish a sole rule of conduct with reference to the shipment of cattle?

The first question was answered in the affirmative and the power of Congress upheld and defined; the last in the negative. In other words, the Supreme Court in that case said that Congress did have the clear and undisputed right to assume entire, absolute, and exclusive jurisdiction of the matter; but, secondly, that it had not done so, and it pointed out what would be necessary to assume exclusive control, and that decision, rendered on the 2d day of December, 1902, was responded to by the Fifty-seventh Congress, of which my friend from Texas was a Member, by the enactment of another statute, which did take sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the subject-matter, so as to bring it within the decision of the Supreme Court, and——

Mr. WILLIAMS. So that men could take the cattle into the State?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes; and, contrary to what I would approve, to leave them there; and if the gentleman wants to see the statute——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I do not think I voted for such a statute; and if I did, I hope God Almighty will forgive me here for doing so.

Mr. BOWERS. Perhaps my friend needs forgiveness. I do not think there was a division or any yea-and-nay vote. I think it was so manifestly and so generally approved that no division was taken on it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But the gentleman is bound by it.

Mr. BOWERS. He is; and it is the law of the land; and if the gentleman wants to find it he will find it in volume 32, part 1, page 792, United States Statutes at Large.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman is not——

Mr. BOWERS. I decline to yield, and before I leave that question I want to say further that on the question of the matter of inspection and certification by the Federal authorities, of a ship from abroad that may attempt to enter any port of the United States, that seems to trouble my friend so much, if he will examine the quarantine act of 1893, which he will find as an appendix to the minority report, and read section 6, he will find by that act that it is now and has been for thirteen years within the power of the Federal authorities to certify a vessel as free from infection, and on that certification it shall pass, without let or hindrance, into any port of the United States, free from any further burden. The only difference between the proposed act and the present law is that under the present law the Federal authorities are not peremptorily required to establish maritime quarantine, but may do so in their discretion. As a matter of administration the Department has declared that it will not establish any such quarantine, unless commanded by Congress to do so, except where the States invite them to take over and administer their quarantines. Some States—Florida, Georgia, and Mississippi—have done this, but unless the law is changed and made mandatory we will have no general national quarantine or national protection. The object of this measure is to make it mandatory, and to secure an effective and uniform system at all the ports, freed from the jealousies of trade and from the dangers incident to bidding for business at the expense of health.

Now, let us see what was said in the Reid case. I read from page 146:

> It is quite true, as urged on behalf of the defendant, that the transportation of live stock from State to State is a branch of interstate commerce and that any specified rule or regulation in respect of such transportation which Congress may lawfully prescribe or authorize, and which may properly be deemed a regulation of such commerce, is paramount throughout the Union. So that when the entire subject of the transportation of live stock from one State to another is taken under direct national supervision and a system devised by which diseased stock may be excluded from interstate commerce, all local or State regulations in respect of such matters and covering the same ground will cease to have any force, whether formally abrogated or not; and such rules and regulations as Congress may lawfully prescribe or authorize will alone control. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 210; Morgan v. Louisiana, 118 U. S., 455, 464; Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S., 299, 317; N. Y., N. H. and H. R. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S., 628, 631; Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S., 613, 626; Rasmussen v. Idaho, 181 U. S., 198, 200.) The power which the States might thus exercise may in this way be suspended until national control is abandoned, and the subject be thereby left under the police power of the States.
> But the difficulty with the defendant's case is that Congress has not by any statute covered the whole subject of the transportation of live stock among the several States, and, except in certain particulars not involving the present issue, has left a wide field for the exercise by the States of their power, by appropriate regulations, to protect their domestic animals against contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

And again, on page 148:

> It should never be held that Congress intends to supersede or by its legislation suspend the exercise of the police powers of the States, even when it may do so, unless its purpose to effect that result is clearly manifested. This court has said, and the principle has often been reaffirmed, that "in the application of this principle of supremacy of an act of Congress in a case where the State law is but the exercise of a reserved power, the repugnance or conflict should be direct and positive, so that the two acts could not be reconciled or consistently stand together." (Sinot v. Davenport, 22 How., 227, 243.)

And again, at page 150:

> Our conclusion is that the statute of Colorado, as here involved, does not cover the same ground as the act of Congress, and therefore is not inconsistent with that act; and its constitutionality is not questioned unless it be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, independently of any legislation by Congress. The latter question we now proceed to examine.
> Certain principles are well settled by the former decisions of this court. One is that the purpose of a statute, in whatever language it may be framed, must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect. (Henderson v. Mayor of New York, 92 U. S., 259, 268.) Another is that a State may not, by its police regulations, whatever their object, unnecessarily burden foreign or interstate commerce. (Railroad Company v. Husen, 95 U. S., 465, 472.) Again, the acknowledged police powers of a State can not legitimately be exerted so as to defeat or impair a right secured by the National Constitution any more than to defeat or impair a statute passed by Congress in pursuance of the powers granted to it. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 210; Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S., 613, 625, 626, and authorities cited.)
> Now, it is said that the defendant has a right, under the Constitution of the United States, to ship live stock from one State to another State. This will be conceded on all hands. But the defendant is not given by that instrument the right to introduce into a State against its will live stock affected by a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and whose presence in the State will or may be injurious to its domestic animals. The State—Congress not having assumed charge of the matter as involved in interstate commerce—may protect its people and their property against such dangers, taking care always that the means employed to that end do not go beyond the necessities of the case or unreasonably burden the exercise of privileges secured by the Constitution of the United States.

From all of which it will be seen not only that the Congress has the right to protect interstate commerce, but that the courts of the United States claim and exercise the jurisdiction to inquire into the reasonableness of any State statute in the nature of a quarantine law, in so far as that law affects interstate commerce.

But let me pile the authorities mountain high upon this question. In Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad v. Haber (169 U. S., p. 613) the question was whether the statutes of Kansas were valid, or contravened the animal-industry act of 1884. In examining that point the court, through Judge Harlan, said, at page 623:

> May not these statutory provisions stand without obstructing or embarrassing the act of Congress? This question must of course be determined with reference to the settled rule that a statute enacted in execution of a reserved power of the State is not to be regarded as inconsistent with an act of Congress passed in the execution of a clear power under the Constitution, unless the repugnance or conflict is so direct and positive that the two acts can not be reconciled or stand together (citing Sinnott v. Davenport, 22 How., pp. 227–243).

And again at 625, etc.:

> In fact the State law is in aid of the objects which Congress had in view when it passed the animal-industry act. It was passed in execution of a power with which the State did not part on entering the Union, namely, the right to protect the people in the enjoyment of their rights of property, and to provide for the redress of wrongs within its limits. * * * We must not be understood as saying that this power may be so exercised as to defeat or burden any power granted to Congress. On the contrary, a State statute, although enacted in pursuance of a power not surrendered to the General Government, must, in the execution of its provisions, yield in case of conflict to a statute constitutionally enacted under authority conferred upon Congress; and this, as was said by Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking for the court in Sinnott v. Davenport, above cited, without regard to the source of power whence the State legislature derived its enactment.
> This results, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall, as much from the nature of the Government as from the words of the Constitution. In that case it was pressed that if a law passed by a State in the exercise of its acknowledged sovereignty comes into conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution, they affect the subject and each other like equal opposing powers.

And again the court repeats the language from Gibbons v. Ogden that I read in the outset.

In Hennington v. Georgia (163 U. S., 309) the court said:

> Of course, if the inspection, health, or quarantine laws of a State, passed under its reserve power to provide for the health, comfort, and safety of its people, come into conflict with an act of Congress passed under its power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, such local regulations, to the extent of the conflict, must give way, in order that the supreme law of the land—an act of Congress passed in pursuance of the Constitution—may have unobstructed operation. The possibility of conflict between State and national enactments, each to be referred to the undoubted powers of the State and nation, respectively, was not overlooked in Gibbons v. Ogden, and Chief Justice Marshall said, etc.

I commend this case, which collates and comments on all the antecedent cases and authorities, to my friends who oppose this bill, as well as to anyone interested in the subject.

In New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad v. New York (165 U. S., p. 631) the court said:

> While the laws of the States must yield to acts of Congress passed in execution of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1), the mere grant to Congress of the power to regulate commerce did not of itself and without legislation by Congress impair the authority of the States to establish such reasonable restrictions as were appropriate for the protection of the health, the lives, and safety of their people.

Thus again reiterating the undisputed doctrine of Federal control.

In Peete v. Morgan (19 Wall., p. 582) the court said in deciding the case:

That the power to establish quarantine laws rests with the States, and has not been surrendered to the General Government, is settled in Gibbons v. Ogden. The source of this power is in the acknowledged right of a State to provide for the health of its people, and although this power, when set in motion, may in a greater or less degree affect commerce, yet the laws passed in the exercise of this power are not enacted for such an object. They are enacted for the sole purpose of preserving the public health, and if they injuriously affect commerce, Congress, under the power to regulate it, may control them.

In Louisiana v. Texas (176 U. S., p. 1) the court said at page 22:

Although from the nature and subjects of the power of regulating commerce it must be ordinarily exercised by the National Government exclusively, this has not been held to be so where in relation to the particular subject-matter different rules might be suitable in different localities. At the same time, Congress could by affirmative action displace the local laws, substitute laws of its own, and correct any unjustifiable and oppressive exercise of power by State legislation.

Railroad Company v. Husen (95 U. S., p. 465) held a statute of the State of Missouri void, because an unreasonable burden and restriction upon interstate commerce. This was the cattle case in which all cattle were excluded during certain seasons of the year. The court said:

The police power of a State can not obstruct foreign commerce or interstate commerce beyond the necessity for its exercise; and under the color of it objects not within its scope can not be secured at the expense of the protection afforded by the Federal Constitution. And as its range sometimes comes very near to the field committed by the Constitution to Congress, it is the duty of the courts to guard vigilantly against any needless intrusion.

So that it has been clearly decided that the entire subject of transportation of live stock from one State to another may be taken under direct national supervision and a system devised by which diseased stock may be excluded from interstate commerce. In this case we have diseased people; and my Heavens! are not people as important as cows? Is not the health of all the citizens of this broad land, their movements and intercourse, and their vast and valuable commerce as sacred in the eye of the law and of the public as a drove of bull yearlings, and is not the suppression of the dread yellow peril of disease as important as the prevention of black tongue and Texas tick fever? Shall we halt or falter here, when we have not only a plain warrant of law, but also a plain mandate of duty, and when the issue involved is thousands of lives and millions of commerce?

These positions involve no war upon the rights of the States. I yield to no man in my contention for a strict construction of the Constitution and for the preservation of every right reserved to them. But I recognize that in this, as in all other situations, the best safeguard of one's own rights is to yield full assent to all the just rights of others. The rights of the States are safest when no attempt is made to encroach upon clear Federal power or to shear the Federal Government of its lawful authority. They are most in peril when the States, momentarily unmindful of the right, attempt to infringe the domain of exclusive Federal jurisdiction.

In the early days of this Republic Thomas Jefferson sounded this warning, and said, in effect, that while the rights of the States should be constantly guarded with jealous care, the same care should be taken to see that the General Government should be fully secured in the enjoyment and exercise of all its delegated powers. Surely we may safely follow him and unquestioningly accept his advice. This rule was correctly stated in Ex parte Siebold (100 U. S., p. 393), where Mr. Justice Bradley said, inter alia:

The true interest of the people of this country requires that both the National and State governments should be allowed, without jealous interference on either side, to exercise all the powers which respectively belong to them, according to a fair and practical construction of the Constitution. State rights and the rights of the United States should be equally respected. Both are essential to the perservation of our liberties and the perpetuity of our institutions. But in endeavoring to vindicate the one we should not allow our zeal to nullify or impair the other.

There is no question of any State's right to quarantine, nor does anyone deny that the States are the sole repositories of the police power. This is clear, and I will reenforce my friends' citations with some others, perhaps even stronger than theirs.

In the Morgan Steamship case it was said:

Nor is it denied that the enactment of quarantine laws is within the province of the States of this Union. (Morgan Steamship Company v. Louisiana, 118 U. S., 400.)

And in the French Company case, heretofore read by me, the court, at page 387, said:

That from an early day the power of the States to enact and enforce quarantine laws for the safety and protection of the health of their inhabitants has been recognized by Congress, is beyond question. That until Congress has exercised its power on the subject such State quarantine laws and State laws for the purpose of preventing, eradicating, or controlling the spread of contagious or infectious diseases are not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, although their operation affects interstate or foreign commerce, is not an open question. The doctrine was elaborately examined and stated in Morgan Steamship Company v. Louisiana Board of Health (118 U. S., 455). That case involved determining whether a quarantine law enacted by the State of Louisiana was repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution because of its necessary effect upon interstate and foreign commerce.

And here follows the extract from that case which I have heretofore quoted at length.

Note further the utterances to the same effect which I have read from Reid v. Colorado (187 U. S.) and Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad v. Haber (169 U. S.), all of which abundantly establish the State's right to quarantine. But the difficulty with our friends who oppose this measure, is that they can not see where the right of the State ends and that of the Federal Government begins. The State may and should legislate to prevent the introduction of disease within its borders, but it may not control, clog, or stop foreign or interstate commerce; and it may not, under the guise of health laws and the police power, defeat the right of other States to pass their uninfected citizens and property through its borders. I am contending for no right to stop either freight or passengers in any State contrary to its regulations, but I do contend for the right of passage through, under proper safeguards and after due inspection and certification, and in that contention I am justified and supported by every utterance of the Supreme Court, from McCullogh v. Maryland to this very hour.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. BOWERS. I desire to turn now from the legal question involved to the issue of fact, the need for the legislation proposed. I dismiss the question of the advisability of the Federal Government taking entire control of maritime or foreign quarantine with the suggestion that I made at the outset. Inasmuch as the Constitution and the power of the Federal Government to make treaties give it control of our relations with foreign countries and of our commerce with them, and because of the fact that, in this matter of excluding disease, no State can live unto itself alone, for whatever comes into your borders by the Government's permission comes into mine; the question is national and not local in its importance and effect, and it is right and proper that the Federal Congress should act in the matter.

It has been suggested by some of the opponents of this measure, who seek to prejudice our northern friends against it on the idea that it is useless extravagance, that this bill marks a new policy of putting the entire burden and expense of international and interstate quarantine upon the Federal Government. I freely confess that it does, and boldly proclaim that it is manifestly right that the United States should carry the load and foot the bills. Does it not control our foreign trade and our relations with foreign powers? Does it not exercise exclusive jurisdiction over interstate commerce and regulate all interstate carriers? Is it not true that yellow fever comes in only as an incident to foreign commerce, and spreads from State to State only because of intercourse between them? Why, then, should not the National Government, at its own expense, purge and purify the commerce which it declares must move, and which it alone regulates? To ask these questions is to answer them. But I hear some complaints at the omission of the reinspection feature of the Williams-Mallory bill that I desire to answer.

I confess that I would like the bill better if it had been retained, because, as to foreign commerce, I believe in the double rather than the single line of defense, but how are we hurt by its omission from this bill? The law of 1893 makes the national inspection final, and I shall not refuse to support this most necessary and meritorious measure because I can't get all I want, or because it does not repeal some provisions of existing law that will, of course, remain law, whether this bill is passed or not. If it were a question of now providing exclusive national inspection at the ports by this bill, that would be another matter and I might not see my way clear to do so, but inasmuch as defeating this measure can not change the existing order of things in that regard, and as the bill is satisfactory in practically every other respect, I cheerfully support it. Indeed, it may be very plausibly argued that this measure enlarges the State's right of reinspection of vessels from foreign ports. At least it contains no prohibition against such reinspection, as does the act of 1893. Besides, whenever the person or thing is once landed and the journey completed, the State's jurisdiction attaches. It is clear beyond doubt that the interstate clause of the Federal Constitution, and the statutes on the subject, follow and protect a shipment—a person or thing—only so long as it is in transit. (See Wabash Railway Co. v. Illinois, 118 U. S., p. 557.) This question is fully discussed in Judson on Interstate Commerce, pages 58–62, where all the cases are collected and the substance of the statute set out.

That as soon as the person or thing has completed the journey and become located, even though temporarily, it becomes subject to the local jurisdiction and local law, is shown by the following authorities: Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall., 123; Brown v. Heusten, 114 U. S., 622; Pittsburg, etc., Coal Company v. Bates, 156 U. S., 577; Judson on Interstate Commerce, page 25. Judson, citing many cases, says:

> Goods brought from one State into another are subject to the taxing power of the State, whether they are in original packages or not.

And, further, he adds:

> The original-package doctrine introduced in Brown v. Maryland (12th Wheat., 419), in reference to foreign importations, becomes material in interstate commerce in limiting the police power of the State. The termination of transit means that the property is subject to taxation in common with other property in the State.

On this point he cites numerous cases. See page 26.

But, after all, this question is more academic than practical. Whenever the Government shall establish a uniform system of quarantine at all the ports, the State stations will be abandoned. Such has been the history of the past. Indeed, I am sure the State stations and plants will all be sold to the Government. Georgia, Florida, and Mississippi have already turned over to the National Government, and the Macedonian cry from Louisiana last year shows the trend of thought and action.

The difficulty heretofore has been that the various ports bid for trade, forgetting for the while the necessary sanitary precautions, and taking too many chances in dealing with possible pestilence. It is hardly to be supposed that they will suddenly and almost over night reverse their policy, and become overcautious where they have been heretofore too lax. And so, after all, to contend further on this point is to sacrifice the substance in a vain pursuit of the shadow.

All this reasoning, gentlemen, applies with equal force to interstate quarantine, and to the much abused and more misunderstood section 7.

It is not proposed by this act, or by that section, to repeal or displace local quarantine laws. They are to be left in full force, to maintain and protect the health of the citizens for whose benefit they were enacted. Section 7 contains a most stringent provision against violation of local laws by the stopping or landing of any person or thing forbidden by the State or municipal regulations. Only the right of passage through is provided for, and that only after the most rigid inspection, disinfection, and certification, and only under the most elaborate precautions, safeguards, and regulations to prevent any possible contagion.

"But," say some of those who captiously criticise this measure, "suppose passengers become sick en route, what is then to be done?" My reply is that such a contingency is a matter of detail in execution and administration, that can and will be easily provided for. The trains will be screened, and ample facilities of all kind to meet every emergency will be provided. The bill expressly contemplates such regulations. But another and perhaps more conclusive answer is that the case supposed can never happen, at least there is not one chance in a thousand that it ever will. Detention camps will be established, passengers will be inspected with great and minute care, their movements for the time in which the disease is known to incubate will be known, and only such as are not only free from disease, but from danger of developing the disease, will be passed; in other words, only uninfected persons. Besides, what is there in section 7 that prevents the State from dealing with passengers who develop disease? I repeat that the decisions quoted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], establish beyond controversy that disease is not commerce, and defeat his own argument, because they demonstrate that whenever disease or infection appear the State has power, even under this act, to deal with it. Section 7 refers only to healthy, uninfected passengers, known from inspection to be such, and identified by certificates to that effect. It has reference to interstate commerce alone, and disease is not commerce. But while localities may deal with disease, they must not, and section 7 wisely says they shall not, hold up uninfected persons and commerce at their borders and deny the right of passage through. They may prevent stoppage, but they may not, and should not, prevent passage. On this point I desire to quote from a recent paper by Edgar H. Farrar, esq., of New Orleans, La., one of the most distinguished lawyers of the South, whose friendship I have enjoyed for many years, for whom and for whose opinions I have the highest regard, and whose luminous contribution to this subject has greatly lightened the labors of all those who have attempted thoughtfully and conscientiously to examine it. In the course of his great and entertaining argument—by great odds the ablest and strongest that has been made against national quarantine since that question was agitated about ten years ago—he says:

> If the States can not agree upon any settlement of the momentous question of quarantine on interstate commerce, and if the present unsatisfactory conditions are not rectified, it will, in my judgment, be the duty of Congress to pass some stringent penal statute punishing any person, whether health officer or not, who shall unlawfully interfere with uninfected interstate trains and uninfected interstate passengers passing through a State. No State has any power to block the highways of interstate commerce, or to lay embargo on interstate commerce under the pretense of exercising quarantine power. That power can be lawfully exercised without any such harsh measures. The limit of its exercise is "necessity." As was said in the Husen case:
> "The police power of the State can not obstruct foreign or interstate commerce, beyond the necessity for its exercise, and it is the duty of the courts to see that under color of it objects not within its scope be not secured at the expense of Federal quarantine."
> The same duty rests upon the Congress that rests upon the courts, and the Congress has the same measure of power to legislate that the courts have to adjudge.

What, I ask again, does section 7 do, beyond what is proposed by this great lawyer and equally great exponent of States rights? The reply is nothing, and it seems as if the framer of that section must have had Mr. Farrar's paper before him when he drafted the paragraph, and must have prepared it with the express purpose of meeting his wise advice and of responding to his suggestion, that the same duty rests upon Congress as the courts, and Congress has the same power to legislate as the courts have to adjudge.

Now, let us for a moment examine how the existing system operates. Outbreaks of yellow fever are uniformly attended with more or less—usually more—panic and hysteria. Towns, villages, localities, and even States become wild with fright, and travel and intercourse is restricted without reason, often cruelly and heartlessly. The rule in interstate quarantine seems to have been exactly the reverse of foreign quarantine. Before the disease enters, the disposition seems to be extremely careless, so long as trade is induced, but after it has once appeared there seems to be a mania to senselessly, needlessly, and cruelly restrict travel and movement of every character. Quarantines are levied against wholly uninfected communities. Towns, counties, and sometimes even States that are free, not only from infection, but also from suspicion of infection, are cut off. Communities set the law at defiance. Great mobs assemble, and in some cases railroad tracks have been torn up and bridges destroyed. I recall an instance in 1898 when a State board of health quarantined a whole section of Mississippi, absolutely free from infection, with a full knowledge of the fact that it was not only clean, but was in no danger, and despite the fact that the inspectors of its own board so reported after having personally examined the situation, which report was confirmed by another State board of health and the Marine-Hospital Service, both of which had thoroughly examined the ground. And this State board of health not only refused to raise, or in any way ameliorate, that quarantine, but threatened to quarantine any other State or locality which did release it, until it was confronted by a bill filed in the Federal courts by a citizen whose right of passage and attention to his business was destroyed, when on the very day set for a hearing of the application for a restraining order, and upon a bill charging that the quarantine had been levied for commercial purposes and as an advertisement of vigilance only, the quarantine was raised. During the year 1897 citizens along a certain line of railroad prohibited the passage of trains of any character whatever over the road, completely held up and stopped interstate commerce, and in order to enforce their prohibition destroyed a bridge and considerable amount of track. During the same year traffic was stopped in other parts of the country and more or less damage wrought, but this instance is cited because it was the most flagrant.

Coming down to the epidemic of yellow fever during the past year, we find that while violence and mob rule were not so rampant the restrictions upon travel were almost as burdensome and perhaps more ludicrous. It is only necessary to cite an instance in which two sovereign States were almost involved in hostilities, the situation at one time growing so serious and acute as to induce the calling out of the entire naval militia of one of them, and the arrest of officials of the other, a situation which was only relieved by the Government stepping in and, under the act of 1893, taking charge of the quarantine between these States.

Again, we have the spectacle of the authorities of a State, backed by its militia and by its special police armed with shotguns and other weapons, acting by and under the authority of the State, claiming to be the guardians of law, absolutely prohibiting fleeing refugees seeking escape from the pest and contagion, the right to pass through the borders of their State, even though it was known that the train which bore them did not expect to stop, except for the purpose of taking fuel and water.

Another instance that came to my knowledge, of hysteria, fear, and panic and stoppage of travel within a State, is a case which took such shape that the health authorities were unable to send nurses, medicines, and physicians to a stricken community in their own State, and were actually forced to smuggle them, by the consent of the authorities of the State of Mississippi, through that State and back into their own, in order that the stricken communities which so sadly needed succor and help might have medical attention and aid. Even in those instances where the right of passage through—and you will understand that my argument is addressed solely to right of passage and not to the right of stoppage—was permitted, it was attended with such restrictions, and granted under such circumstances of hardship, as to loudly call for relief. My own experience will serve to illustrate the point. I live upon the seacoast of Mississippi, in a county contiguous to the Louisiana line and in a town about 50 miles from New Orleans. That town during the whole of the outbreak, and the country except for a few days—and with the exception of two imported cases, which occurred in the northern end of it more than twenty-odd miles from the coast, which were stamped out at once without any spread whatever—were entirely free from the disease.

Notwithstanding these facts, all of this territory, together with a large additional area, absolutely clean and free from infection, inspected by the health authorities of interested States and known to be so, was quarantined and kept under quarantine during the whole season. This would not have been burdensome at the time, if a reasonable right of passage had been granted, but, mark you, that was not done. If any person from that section, properly armed with a health certificate, and with a certificate that he had not been in any infected territory or exposed to contagion, wanted to go north or east, he could travel through the quarantining State in a closed car, confined, perforce, with passengers from the stricken city of New Orleans; but if after he had transacted his business north or east he desired to return to his home again, seeking only to pass through under such surveillance as the authorities might see fit to impose and under the most thorough guaranty that there was no danger of his disembarking within the State, he was met at the border with a refusal, and with the statement that while he might go out he could not return until he had stayed out seven days; and this information was coupled with a statement that if he remained on the train and the conductor and railroad company failed to eject him, the train would be held up at the State line and not permitted to enter or pass through. These are actual experiences—experiences that I, in common with many others, underwent, and, in my judgment, they call for relief.

To my mind to state these conditions is to make manifest the necessity for some regulation that will permit reasonable and sensible travel—to demonstrate that there should be some power, some central authority, some uniform regulation, to which all can conform and which will permit sane and sensible intercourse.

My friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] says that for one hundred and seven years we have satisfactorily coped with the disease and permitted travel, under existing laws.

Does this look like it? Do the outbreaks and epidemics that have recurred in swift succession, with their attendant sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives and millions of property, indicate that our present laws and methods are all that is needed?

The one question of conflict of regulations, with a different law and different set of rules at each State line, is alone enough to demand relief. Why, the situation between Mississippi and Alabama grew such during last year that a friend of mine at Meridian, Miss., who was a victim of the quarantine between these States, sent up a touching petition in verse for cold weather to regulate the quarantines. I give it to the House:

O Lord, Thou seest how we are lost
In this awful quarantine.
Unless Thou send a little frost,
Our finish can be seen.
There is no peace or counsel calm
'Twixt "Mississip" and "Alabam."

O Lord, in all this sultry weather
No comfort can we get.
If Thou wilt change it altogether,
We'll not forget—we'll not forget.
For there is not a happy spot,
While it's so hot—while it's so hot.

O Lord, upon our bended knees
The common people all together
Beseech Thee for one honest freeze—
Real hard, cold, winter weather.
And boards of health will have no terrors
If the north wind through the forest wanders.

My friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] says that Texas can take care of this matter, as far as she is concerned, and cites us to the fact that they kept the yellow fever out last year. True, Mr. Speaker, but he forgets that since 1844 the yellow fever has been introduced into the United States twelve different times through the Texas ports and over her Mexican border.

That may have been taking care of Texas, but it played havoc with the other States.

And now, Mr. Speaker, let me disclaim any intention to criticise or animadvert on any health officer or board of health. I am willing to concede to all of them the desire to do right, and I know that much good has followed their efforts. My argument and criticism is aimed at the system and method, which permits such outrageous and varied abuses, which I would change, and for which I would substitute a broad, national system, contemplated and authorized by the Constitution, and which will not only protect commerce, but preserve the health of all the people of this Union. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOWERS. I ask unanimous consent to revise, enlarge, and extend my remarks in the RECORD. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WANGER. In connection with that request, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask that all Members who speak on this question may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire how much time is left on this side? Fifty-six minutes, I think.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has fifty-four minutes remaining.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

[Mr. BURLESON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

[Mr. BEALL of Texas addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time is left on each side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi and his side have fifty-two minutes remaining. The other side has forty-three minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much time have I of the fifty-three?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I think there has been, to use the words of an old friend whose language I have frequently repeated, "a great deal of qui viveness and not very much appropriousness about the debate against this bill." The thing to be discussed is the bill, and gentlemen on the other side have been careful not to discuss it. Anybody can lay down the proposition that the reserved police power of a State is sacred, and the Federal Government can not interfere with it. Anybody upon the other side can lay down the proposition that the clear and express power of the Federal Government to regulate interstate commerce and foreign commerce is sacred and can not be interfered with by the State; but the point is, Where does the line of demarcation come? The point is, Where and how does this bill affect either one or the other? The gentleman who drew up the minority report takes eleven pages, quoting a whole lot of decisions of the Supreme Court, and when he gets through all that he has done is to prove that States have exclusive police power within their respective territories. Nobody but a fool ever thought they did not. Nobody ever disputed it; no man that deserves a law license ever would raise the issue against them on that proposition. But there is not a word in his report, and not a word in the debate on the other side upon the floor, to show that there is a single provision of this bill which trenches upon the police power of the State within its territory. That is all the police power there is. The State has no jurisdiction of any sort, no police power or anything else outside of its territory, and the State has such jurisdiction within its territory, even, as has not, by the voluntary action of the States, been delegated to the Federal Government, either expressly or by necessary implication.

In answer to a remark by the gentleman who last spoke, I wish to say that the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from Georgia are standing here to-day as strict constructionists. There is not a thing in this bill that John C. Calhoun could have voted against. There is not a thing in this bill any more touching the sacred rights of a State reserved and not delegated than the effluvia of a dead cat in the Desert of

I am not frightened by any tirade of criticism because I procured a special rule to consider this important and emergency legislation. I am confronted with certain parliamentary machinery. I did not create it. I must work with it if I am to procure results. I am not fool enough to leave Republicans alone to avail themselves of it and leave the South helpless to the ravages of another epidemic because I will not use the House machinery. I am not at all afraid about an attack upon my devotion to the doctrine of State rights. I am standing here to-day for the most sacred of all State rights, and what is it? The right of the people of a State to demand, when they have rendered themselves powerless and helpless by the delegation of a given authority, that the Federal Government, to whom the authority has been delegated, shall assert it for the protection of the people of the State. The gentleman who took his seat just before the last gentleman, my friend from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], said we wanted to unload on the Federal Government the expense of meeting this foe who never attacks us save by importation. Yes; we ought to unload it, and it ought to take it up. It is not only within the power, but it is the duty of the Federal authorities, and they are recalcitrant to their duty when they do not. The gentleman says that when a public enemy comes to our shores the people of the States meet him. Yes; the public enemy is met by the power of the State and by the power of the Federal Government both acting in cooperation with one another. "Unload the expense!" Yes; you have unloaded all other imports upon the Federal Government, and why not unload the expense of yellow-fever importation? You have unloaded the Army, you have unloaded the Navy, you have unloaded everything else that is absolutely national. You have unloaded the jurisdiction over foreign commerce upon the Federal Government. The States when they established the Constitution did this wholesale "unloading." The gentleman says: "Oh, well; but disease is not commerce." Who in the world ever said it was; who in the world ever imagined it was? But the things and the persons that carry disease are commerce, and in so far as foreign commerce and interstate commerce are concerned, they ought to be regulated in such a way as to be purged of disease. Why, gentlemen talk as if the object of this bill was to import yellow fever into Texas. The object of the bill is to get the aid of the Federal Government to keep yellow fever out of Texas; to get the aid and the money of the Federal Government to keep yellow fever out of Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. But Texas can do that for herself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Judging by what I know of that post, I would rather have the strong arm of the Federal Government to help her. Then the gentleman says disease is not commerce. Of course it is not, and this bill does not say that disease is commerce. Now, section 7 was not in the original Mallory-Williams bill. It was put in as an amendment by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of this House. I am not tied to it, but I am prepared to defend it as absolutely constitutional and as not interfering with a single dogma of States rights, even of the John C. Calhoun or the JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS school, because I take my footing there with Calhoun. There is not a thing in section 7 that hints even at the idea that disease is or can be commerce. What does it say? Why, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] I do not believe ever read section 7 from the way he talked about it and from the way he answered questions put to him concerning it. It says—and I wish you to mark the language:

Every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall—

under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport through—

"Through," "through," "through"—not "into" any State or Territory of the United States—through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into—into a State where its delivery or debarkation may be lawful.

That is to say, into a State beyond the yellow-fever zone.

Mr. BURLESON. How can they go through a State without going into it?

Mr. HENRY of Texas rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not yield now. To continue—

All passengers, freight, or baggage—

And does it stop there? No, a thousand times no. If it had stopped there, the gentleman from Texas might have been, to some slight extent, justified in what he said; but, no, it does not stop there—all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Expressly, then, the bill refers only to trains examined, inspected, found to be uninfected, and certified to be so. Any other sort of train can be dealt with by the State and turned back by its police. It is when disease begins that regulation of it as commerce ends and the police power attaches.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I can not yield.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. But the gentleman said that I never read the section, whereas in fact I read it to the House. I want to ask this question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I had just eleven minutes in which to talk to a great question on a bill of which I am the author, and the gentleman, who had unlimited time, yielded to me so unwillingly twice and declined twice that I will now "return good for evil" and yield to him.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Very well. If the Federal Government has a right to take interstate commerce through a State, hasn't it the same right to take it there and land it in the State?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman voted that way in the cattle-quarantine case, where the object was to prevent the passage of cattle—Texas cattle—from being interfered with by the exercise of the police power of Colorado.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I think the gentleman did. I remember distinctly when it came before the House that every member of the Texas delegation voted for it who was in the House at that time. I wish I had time to read the drastic and rigid provisions of that bill, so much further reaching in the assertion of Federal power and the prohibition of local interference than this bill is.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That does not answer the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not say so; but I am answering this now; and let me finish this particular point. Section 7 does not apply to any infected train—"disease-laden" train as one of the gentlemen phrased it. Section 7 expressly applies only to such trains as are declared and pronounced and certified as noninfected, and to no other sort of a train. Later on it says that every person interfering with or obstructing "such" carrier or with any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any "such" carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, etc.

Interfering with a "disease-laden" train is not forbidden nor punished by this act. It is true that the Marine-Hospital Service under this bill will judge and say whether the train or ship is infected or not, but whence arises the presumption that it will certify falsely?

I may have misunderstood my friend, but I understood him to say this bill would enable them to land a yellow-fever patient or goods from a yellow-fever port in Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I said the same power would give the right to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not believe a man ever had before the House a bill as large and important as this with as short a time to discuss it in, but the bill itself contradicts the gentleman and says that this section "shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to debark"—that is, to debark as a passenger—"or unload freight in any locality contrary to the regulations" of the State or locality.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not yield now. Now, the gentleman says Texas will not have the right to stop and inspect a train going through. In the name of God, what do you want to stop it for? If an infected train should go through Mississippi, if it ever did, and it could not go under this law, but if it should go through there every Mississippian with common sense would say, "hustle it through as fast as you can." We do not want any right to stop it; we do not want to fool with it; all we ask is for it to go at the rate of 50 miles an hour and get outside of the State as rapidly as possible. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. If I understood the gentleman, it can not stop in Texas. If it is a train to Mexico and the Republic of Mexico refuses to let it in, would it not have to stop in Texas?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, undoubtedly in that case. Mexico can do that anyhow under existing law or any law. Congress can not circumscribe the sovereign and independent power of the Republic of Mexico.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry I have had only this time of eleven minutes wherein to discuss this bill.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield some of his time?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, this bill naturally divides itself into two parts, one relating to quarantine and the other relating to interstate commerce. It is called a "quarantine bill," and the main part relates to the establishment of stations for inspection and detention, with a view of preventing the introduction into this country of yellow fever, but section 7 entirely departs from the purpose of the bill and provides for the business of transportation. It goes from the general provision and the general purpose with reference to quarantine and deals with the subject of transportation. Section 7 has no harmony with or reasonable part in this bill. It is out of harmony with every other part of it. Section 7 evidently must have been introduced, not with a view of preventing the introduction or spread of yellow fever, but with a view of placating some corporation engaged in transportation. How can section 7, in any construction of it, by any application of it, lessen the amount of yellow fever coming into the country or remaining in the country or spreading through it when once introduced? Section 7 might just as well and just as constitutionally provide, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has argued, for the disembarkation of freight and passengers within a State as to provide for their transportation through a State. It is not at all a quarantine measure, but its presence in the act, if it becomes a law, will tend to the spread of yellow fever instead of tending to check the spread of yellow fever. If upheld by the courts it would take away the power of the States to prevent yellow fever from coming within their borders. Suppose, nowithstanding the inspection and the O. K. provided by this bill, a train carrying infected persons enters a State—crosses the line of the State or passes through the State—all possibility of excluding or checking the disease by any State agency is taken away by the provisions of this section 7, if valid.

Now, I think it has been demonstrated, and I suppose anybody who knows anything about it understands, that the mosquito is the agency for the spread of yellow fever. Suppose that a single mosquito, a single infected mosquito, were to be in a train coming from an infected point——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DE ARMOND. That mosquito of itself could bring yellow fever into a community and communicate it to any person——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield to an interruption? Is the gentleman aware of the fact one of the regulations of the Marine-Hospital Service in connection with these trains starting from infected points is that they shall be screened from beginning to end of them, and a mosquito could not land to save his life?

Mr. DE ARMOND. That has nothing to do with the proposition I am upon. The proposition I am on has reference to section 7. It is not legislation to prevent the spread of yellow fever, but legislation to facilitate the operations of the great railroad companies. [Loud applause.] Evidently it was put in at their suggestion. It is not fair for them or for anybody to urge legislation as a protection against yellow fever when it tends to increase the danger by taking away the possibility of meeting and lessening it by action of the State authorities. But if one object of this bill is to facilitate reckless interstate commerce, then section 7 is a very important and essential part of it. If the sole object is to bring an additional agency into the field to prevent the introduction and the spread of yellow fever, then section 7 ought to go out, because it weakens the bill.

Mr. Speaker, to some of us it hardly appears necessary at one and the same time, by one and the same bill, to force Members to vote against some wholesome quarantine legislation or to vote for reckless freedom of traffic at the sacrifice of wholesome State inspection. But as the Senate has passed a quarantine bill free from the contamination of selfish railroad interests and free, also, from the unwise and needless elimination of the agency of the States in the contest against this dread disease, yellow fever, we may hope later on for that decent division of the question which is denied here and now.

Why not leave the railroads and their desires, manifested in the cold count of dollars, for some other day?

With section 7 eliminated not an atom of efficiency would be taken from the General Government fight against disease. Upon the contrary, with section 7 out of the bill, the force fighting the fever would be increased by every State agency organized for the contest. Section 7 rejects the aid of the States in fighting the fever in order to help the railroads to introduce and scatter it in communities which but for them would be free from its ravages.

We have heard about the iniquity of putting "riders" upon appropriation bills. Here we have railroad interests as riders upon a quarantine bill. Keep out the yellow fever, if you can, after providing for the gentle railroaders at the expense of the States.

If section 7 were not in the law, and if the authorities of a State should stop a train from an infected point, and if the train were entirely free from every agency by means of which the disease could be communicated—even then no harm would be done as to the quarantine or any of its legitimate objects. The railroad company, however, might be delayed in the movement of its train, or might even be forced to a longer or less desirable route. Who, then, will say that section 7 is a quarantine provision? Who will deny that it is a railroad section?

But suppose—and the supposition is not unreasonable—that the train stopped by the State authorities, in the exercise of the police powers of the State, carried the agencies for introducing into the State—bringing upon the people of the State—the scourge of yellow fever; then would not the State be a most efficient aid to the General Government in the quarantine work? What, then, would be the office of section 7? It would strike down the defender of the lives of the people to clear the track for some soulless corporation pitilessly devoted to money making.

Why not have the National Government and the State governments working in harmony? Why legislate for the railroads in a way to remove State agency from its useful work? Why put railroad interests above the interests of humanity? Such incongruous legislation is not born of necessity, but of choice. Will the time ever come when any matter of great public policy can have consideration and treatment free from the taint of corporate touch?

Divorce the people's interest in protection against dreadful epidemics of yellow fever and other terrible scourges from the interests of railroad operators in accumulating wealth, and you will no longer find such sections as section 7 in a quarantine bill. I shall vote against this section 7 if to do so I must vote against the bill, for which, with section 7 stricken out, I would be glad to vote.

Mr. WANGER. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, on this side of the House we have not participated much in the discussion of the constitutionality of the various provisions of this bill. There is nothing particularly personal to us in it. But we have considered our duty to it must be to legislate as best we could and as we ought to do for the interest of the whole country. When this measure was presented to the Committee of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I must admit my own prejudice against it. I did not believe that there ought to be taken from the States any of their reserve police powers or any which they were capable of exercising or have ever exercised. I did not favor the creation of any additional offices or the granting of any additional powers to the National Government, because all such always entail added responsibility and much larger expense; and especially as a matter of good legislation I did not favor any floating grant of power so that a large amount of money could be expended anywhere that any executive officer should deem necessary without an express direction of Congress therefor.

But when the reasons for this measure were fully presented to us, after conference with our colleagues, when we realized the deplorable condition of the Gulf States, the members of the majority of your committee did not believe it their duty to deliberate and discuss constitutional propositions when pestilence might stalk within our borders, when men would die, when the commerce of our people would languish, when disaster might come upon a large section of our people. We believed it was a duty incumbent upon us to adopt such protectionary measures as should best protect these people and preserve these great interests. This bill, in essence, provides two things: First, adequate measures to protect the borders of our country, to keep pestilence without our territory, and, second, adequate measures to inspire confidence among the people so that they could pursue their usual avocations and preserve their courage, composure, and health. These two subjects were impressed upon us as equally important; to prevent pestilence coming, and then to inspire confidence in our people that they should be protected. Considering this measure in these lights, we found it necessary to considerably amend the bill, and we have amended it, and it seems to me that the argument of the gentlemen from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. BOWERS] clearly meets our views as to our power and duty in the premises.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I would like to ask the gentleman in what respect section 7 is an amendment to the existing bill, and how that will keep out yellow fever?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If the gentleman will allow me, I will get to it in a minute, if my time permits.

We found it necessary that quarantine stations should be established which would aid in excluding yellow fever from the country; second, that stations and anchorages for vessels should be established, not now provided by law, but limiting the number of them to four. These could be employed in keeping yellow fever out of the country, and if it were found here, would confine it and protect the people; and in that way confidence would be established, and the people would be protected. Now, as to the provision in section 7. One of the necessary things which we believed necessary to protect the people, necessary to inspire confidence because that is equally as important as protection, was that the people should have the right of ingress and egress, so that they would be able to go where they believed it to be necessary, and be sure wherever they went that they were protected. They realizing in these Gulf States that the laws and administration of local measures did not protect them, and that it was necessary to have the great arm of the Federal Government over them with its rules and regulations, restrictions and safeguards established by a competent authority with the great treasurer and power of the National Government, by all these they know that they will be protected. This inspires confidence in each other, in the administration of the law, and this protects the interests of the people and their commerce. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WANGER. Does my colleague on the committee, Judge DAVEY, desire any time? If not, I will yield to my colleague [Mr. ADAMSON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], my colleague on the committee, such time as he may desire to use.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] for his great generosity and courtesy, which I can not afford to abuse. The debate is limited to this day, and up to this time the House has heard but two members of the committee, both Republicans. None of the four Democratic members of the committee who helped shape this substitute, and are able intelligently and satisfactorily to explain its provisions, have yet spoken. I desire that several of my Republican colleagues on the committee shall be heard, and I am especially anxious that the Democratic committeemen who support the substitute should say something in its behalf. All of the six Democratic members of the committee labored faithfully and conscientiously to solve the problems presented. It is regretted that two of them were not able finally to agree with us. Not only were we unable to satisfy them, but opposition from the majority was also so intense at one time that no hope of favorable action was felt; yet four Democrats continued to labor with our Republican brethren until an agreement was reached by sixteen members of the committee—all but two. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Judge RICHARDSON] can not be too highly commended for the patriotic efforts which he never ceased to put forth. He "poured oil on the troubled waters," and by his courtly grace and legal knowledge secured the action of the committee. The Williams-Mallory bill was dead. Judge RICHARDSON alone saved it; and with the help of his first three Democratic colleagues, together with the patriotic, conciliatory spirit of the Republican members, agreed upon such amendments as made this substitute bill possible. To Judge RICHARDSON of Alabama is due the credit for whatever legislation results from the action of our committee, as I believe every member thereof will testify. I am proud to have been one of his humble helpers.

Quarantine is derived from quaranta or quarantina, which originally signified forty, and in ancient times denoted the period of forty days during which an incoming vessel was compelled to isolate herself and abstain from contact with persons and things on shore, on the theory that if she or any of her passengers had been exposed to contagion or infection of any character it would certainly develop within six weeks, and during that time danger of transmission through baggage or merchandise was obviated by general purification of everything on board, so that if at the end of that period of restraint no person became affected all restraint was removed; passengers and crew were permitted to communicate freely with persons on shore and to deliver baggage and commodities without restriction. From antiquity the common sense of mankind, constantly enlightened by growing experience, recognized that one way to preserve health was to prevent the introduction of disease, and the surest way to accomplish that was to prohibit persons and property suspected of contagion from going into localities which were free from disease. It was not the custom to limit the restraint to known cases of infection, but it was extended to persons and things, usually ships (because trains had not been invented), which were only suspected of hailing from infected ports.

In modern times the advance of science has reduced the time of detention, fixing different periods for different diseases, according to their nature and the known requirements for their prevention and treatment. The application of the scriptural doctrine that cleanliness is next to godliness has shed great light on the subject, resulting in more intelligent and effectual methods both in dealing with infection and in removing the causes thereof.

In the case of yellow fever, against which this bill is chiefly directed, it has been demonstrated that the only isolation necessary is screening the person afflicted so that the mosquitoes, which alone communicate the disease, can not sting or bite him. He may remain in the immediate presence and sight of people who see and converse with him, breathe the same air, eat and drink with him, touch him, sleep with him, may even be bitten by the same mosquito in his presence, and yet be perfectly immune against the disease, unless the same mosquito has bitten him first. The contagion can not be transmitted unless the virus is extracted from his fever-stricken blood and infused into the others. That is done through the medium of the mosquito, which first bites the sick man and then bites others.

There has been some hint of objection to this appropriation for the alleged reason that it is intended to benefit only a part of the country, and it has been suggested that the provision should be uniform and so broadened as to apply to all contagious diseases which are liable to appear in any part of the Union. The word "uniformity" is used in existing laws, but it is not construed to mean the same treatment for all regions and all diseases. It is proper to observe uniformity in regulations relating to any single disease which may threaten or infect any particular portion of our country subject to its ravages, or the ports of which may be portals for its entry. In such case the advantage of uniformity is twofold. First, it prevents discrimination between ports and localities; second, it clearly informs all persons of the regulations applicable to all places controlled by the regulations as to the particular disease. One uniform system covering all diseases threatening the entire country is impossible. The Secretary of the Treasury recognizes the fact in promulgating regulations to govern quarantine. He first defines and classifies the various quarantinable diseases, and then, with scrupulous regard for conditions affecting, introducing, preventing, and eradicating the various diseases, prescribes different rules and regulations for each.

The Supreme Court has denied that uniformity is attainable or even desirable in quarantine regulations designed to operate through and around a great Republic 3,000 miles in extent, whose territory partakes of every condition of climate, and which at various ports may have to battle with all the different contagions that afflict any portion of the globe. (118 U. S., 465–466.)

We limit this bill to yellow fever, because at present that looms up as the most threatening great foreign foe against which our country needs protection. It is true the disease can not afflict and kill people in all parts of the country, but it can demoralize the business of the people by its effects on commerce. Inroads of other contagions upon other parts of the country would operate in similar manner, but in reverse order. The people directly afflicted might languish and die while we retain life and health, but in greater or less degree the business of the country would suffer, while the pall of gloom spread over the entire Union would scarcely equal our heartfelt sympathy for our fellow-countrymen immediately involved in the pestilence.

We are willing to do as much in protecting against invasion of any other part of the country by any other disease when necessary as we ask Congress to do in this case. It is not right for one city or State to bear all the brunt of the battle waged for the common benefit of us all. A scourge at New Orleans is not destructive to that city and her people alone, but menaces, if it does not attack, the health of thirty millions of people, and may paralyze the business and suspend the communication and mar the peace and happiness of our entire eighty millions. Such a city may be likened unto Thermopylae, but whether or not all the brave defenders perish and expend all their substance, the insidious enemy may baffle their efforts and ravage the entire Atlantic and Gulf slope, with the Mississippi Valley. Those devoted and stricken patriots fight for us all as well as themselves.

Other States like my own, after having surrendered their quarantine stations to the Federal Government, or having exercised all vigilance themselves, may have secured as complete immunity from foreign importation of disease as human ingenuity can vouchsafe, and yet from insufficient protection or unwise relaxation of energy, whether from selfish commercial reasons or otherwise, the dread disease may enter the country a thousand miles away, and, wafted across the country with an afflicted passenger in commerce, may find the ever-ready mosquito to disseminate the malady to destroy the very people who, having discharged their full duty, entertain such high sense of security. It is therefore manifest that there should be no objection to the expenditure contemplated in this bill on the score of local benefit. The pending bill proposes that the Federal Government take a long step forward in the discharge of its plain duty to the people. That beneficent progress should not be impeded nor questioned by doctrinaires of any persuasion. Congressmen ought to know the Constitution which they have sworn to support and permit neither prejudice against State lines nor jealousy of Federal power to becloud their correct understanding thereof.

We are sworn to support the Constitution as it is, which was made by States and can only be amended by States, but provides as sacredly for the power and integrity of the Federal Government in the exercise of its delegated functions as for the dignity and sovereignty of the States in performing the great mass of the duties of government under their reserved rights. The Constitution forms and perpetuates neither an autocratic, centralized, and paternalistic empire nor a discordant aggregation of independent and belligerent States, but constitutes the palladium and shield of a great Republic in which indestructible sovereign States constitute an indissoluble union, the general affairs of which are to be administered by the Federal Government for the benefit of all the people, at once the citizens of the States and beneficiaries of all the protection of this great Republic. True the expense of administration and protection grows greater, but dangers increase and multiply as the population grows, and the States and the Republic advance in wealth, power, greatness, and glory. The pending bill makes no departure from the system heretofore pursued by the Federal Government, but is only a meritorious enlargement thereof.

Recognizing that quarantine belongs properly to the reserved police powers of the States, and that no quarantine power as such ever vested in the Federal Government, but is only implied as necessary to regulate commerce, Congress and the Executive have, through all administrations and changes of parties, limited their efforts in the nature of quarantine to aiding the State authorities. They have never claimed any such power within a State even as an incident of commerce, but have cooperated with the States in protecting the people. As to the well-established right and duty to exercise exclusive control as to matters of police, including health and morals, together with a great mass of subjects of internal regulation, a long and unvarying line of decisions by our Supreme Court leaves no doubt.

The Federal Government, however, is vested with exclusive power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. Its duty is coextensive with its power. With scrupulous fidelity and caution it should so discharge that duty as not to imperil the health and safety of the people nor interfere with the efforts of the State to preserve such health and safety. Though clothed with no quarantine power as such, the Federal Government should, under its incidental power, protect every inch of our borders by throwing around our foreign commerce such safeguards that no infection can overleap or evade to bring disease among our people. We should likewise provide that interstate commerce should facilitate the transit of passengers, freight, and baggage under Federal supervision so faithful and vigilant as absolutely to prevent that commerce from transmitting contagion from one State to another. The commerce clause, like any other grant of power, implies and carries with it the right to do all things natural, necessary, and proper to exercise the power delegated. That has been clearly held. As quarantine stations, agents, and foreign inspection are recognized as the proper and necessary means in the regulation of foreign commerce to guard against infection accompanying that commerce, and as faithful supervision and precautions are unquestionably the proper means to prevent interstate commerce from impairing the health and safety of the people, it is by necessary legal implication clearly within the power of Congress to extend and broaden its traditional policy as to health laws by passing the present bill in the form substituted by the committee.

Present law is defective in three particulars. While amply providing for information and inspection in foreign ports and due precaution as to inspecting and certifying vessels bound for our ports it is inadequate, first, to establish quarantine grounds and anchorages of refuge to receive infected ships with their cargoes and passengers sent thither for the disinfection of ship and cargo and the treatment of the passengers; and, second, it fails to secure the vital and most essential element of protection known as "quarantine stations and anchorages" for vessels, which acting as sentinels police and guard our ports, to apprehend and inspect suspicious ships and compel such as are infected to repair for treatment to the quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge; and, third, it fails specifically to authorize the Federal authorities to discharge the manifest duty to preserve and maintain through traffic as to passengers, freight, and baggage under such faithful supervision as will aid rather than impair or question the efforts of the various States to preserve the health and safety of the people remembering that quarantine is not an active agency by which travelers and commodities may be forced upon unwilling communities, but in fact is a negative instrumentality by whatsoever authority resorted to, the purpose of which is to suspend movement and operation until safety is reasonably assured.

"Quarantine" means only the right to prohibit or qualify entrance, and never to compel entrance, a right inherent in and reserved to the States, which the State may exercise whether the Federal Government protects or not. The same port may at one time have the protection of both. One may withdraw its negation, leaving the protection of the other. Both may withdraw their objections and leave the port without any established quarantine at all, but no constitutional authority exists to compel the landing at any port of anything or anybody over the objection of either Federal or State authorities. Any statute attempting such action would be absolutely void.

Section 6 of the act of 1893 is sometimes misconstrued to be an attempt, whether successful or not, to break down local authority, in that it provides "that any vessel certified by the Federal authorities may enter any port of the United States." Then, in its misconstrued shape, certain statesmen regard it as not only authority, but a precedent for other legislation on which they base the erroneous doctrine that the Federal Government, having examined a vessel, may force the landing of passengers, crew, and freight and baggage despite the inhibition of local quarantine, although the same statesmen admit that immediately after landing they all become subject to the police control of the State.

A series of errors from false premises, through illogical argument to ridiculous and disastrous conclusion. The language in section 6 clearly means that so far as concerns Federal law, Federal authority, and Federal interference, entrance and landing shall not be further opposed. The concurrent operation of the two—Federal and State—authorities, each exercising a negative or veto power against the entrance of a ship or its contents to that port, is nowhere denied in that section. But, on the contrary, is expressly recognized by authorizing vessels bound for certain ports to undergo local quarantine in lieu of Federal quarantine wherever sufficient quarantine provision has been made by the State. If the other construction were correct, the provision would be unconstitutional and absolutely void.

Our path of duty is outlined in the pending bill, and is plain, simple, and unquestioned. Having no delegated quarantine power as such under the Constitution, but being vested with the exclusive control and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with necessary power and means of exercise implied, we can and should see to it that foreign commerce is so regulated that it shall bear no infection to our shores. But that by no means supports the monstrous doctrine that we should unconstitutionally seek to prevent the State in which a port may be situated from exercising its undisputed right, through its police authorities, to exercise quarantine surveillance to prevent the entrance of the same infection.

Our other plain duty, fully undertaken in this bill, is in connection with interstate commerce, and Congress should authorize such regulation as will insure the passage of through travel and traffic on through trains through any and all the States. With health certificates from competent authorities at the initial point, passengers, freight, and baggage should be taken and conveyed through the States under rules, regulations, and safeguards prescribed by the Federal authorities. But there is no reason why the Federal authorities should be inimical to the people of any State, and seek to endanger their health and safety by disregard of the State regulations as to health. Our regulations should prevent unnecessary stops within a State; we should be cautious to allow no contact with the people through whose State the train passes; and we should forbid any passenger, freight, or baggage to leave the train in any State in which the quarantine regulations prohibit such.

The officials of the common carriers, the officials of the Federal Government, the passengers alighting, and the persons receiving and delivering the freight and baggage should be punished in the Federal courts, as well as for making unnecessary stops of the train or indulging in contact or communication with the people. We should likewise provide for the severe, speedy, and certain punishment of all persons, official or otherwise, who obstruct or interfere with the officials and servants of any common carrier operating trains in interstate commerce under the regulation and supervision of the Federal authorities. This is all there is in it, just as plain as day, and involves no friction whatever between State and Federal authorities, and justifies no talk about the supremacy of jurisdiction. The Federal Government should do its duty, and the States should do their duty. There should be no conflict between them. We would then have intelligent quarantine, which would revive and facilitate commerce when already prostrate and demoralized by infection and death or the dread thereof.

The conflicts which make trouble arise between one State and another rather than between anybody and the Federal Government, the danger feared being that the State on guard at the danger point might not provide adequate protection for itself and its neighbors. The Federal authorities would probably never encounter any local resistance or question of supremacy unless in the following way: The State has reserved exclusive jurisdiction over quarantine. The Federal Government has by delegation exclusive power over interstate and foreign commerce and, incident thereto, all the authority necessary to exercise the power. Quarantine, though apparently a hindrance and burden on commerce, is actually the reverse. It is not applied until either invasion or apprehension thereof has already demoralized commerce. If wisely established, so as to inspire confidence in its efficiency and fairness, its effect will be to revive and stimulate commerce, thus proving a blessing rather than a hindrance.

The exercise of the police power is held by the Supreme Court to be independent of and unaffected by the power of Congress to regulate commerce, for the simple and sufficient reason that disease, pestilence, and pauperism are not subjects of commerce, not things to be regulated and trafficked in, but to be prevented as far as human foresight and human means can guard against them, and it is clearly the right and duty of the States to do that. (12 Wheaton, 419; 5 Howard, 504, 574, and 576; 118 U. S., 455.)

The same and several other cases discuss and deal with the validity of State laws, possibility of conflict with Federal laws, and the extent to which State laws must yield, distinctly demonstrating that as to purely police and health laws, in apparent good faith enacted, there can be no question of the State's exclusive power and duty; that for such purposes restrictions and even necessary destruction may be imposed on interstate and foreign commerce, and only when the State attempts to deal with interstate commerce as such, or to interrupt it by palpably misdirected and unwarranted regulations, under pretense of health or police laws, is the constitutional provision infringed and a case of conflict presented, in which the State regulation must yield; but it is clearly stated that the Federal law must be constitutional and the State law manifestly unconstitutional. (5 Howard, 587, lower half page, Gibbons v. Ogden.)

In same case (5 Howard, 590) Mr. Justice MacLean says:

> These exceptions are always implied in commercial regulations, where the General Government is admitted to have exclusive power. They are not regulations of commerce, but acts of self-preservation. And although they affect business to some extent, yet such effect is the result of the exercise of an undoubted power in the State.

In 141 U. S., 61, the court declares that such things as are clearly injurious to the lives and health of the people are placed beyond the protection of the commerce power of Congress. Our court clearly recognizes that quarantine restrictions and police provisions, in good faith enacted as such, can not be overridden under pretense that they are attempts to regulate commerce, and therefore obnoxious to the commerce clause of the Constitution. It is possible for commerce to be affected in a number of ways, and utterly suspended as often as disease and death ride on every tainted breeze, but no such condition is a regulation or an attempt to regulate commerce. (95 U. S., 469; 93 U. S., 103; 114 U. S., 214.)

The rule appears to be that only in case local laws are obvious shams, without substantial relation to their pretended objects, or constitute palpable invasion of fundamental law, will courts question their validity. (163 U. S., 303, bottom of page; 123 U. S., 661; 136 U. S., 313-350.)

It is as well established as any earthly fact that commerce can not force into any State any person or thing contrary to a police regulation established expressly for the preservation of health or morals, but it is equally clear that no such regulation shall be enacted for the real though not expressed purpose of regulating commerce or interfering with a Federal regulation of commerce. When a dispute arises, if it ever does, between the authorities of a State exercising quarantine and the authorities of the Federal Government regulating and supervising commerce, the Supreme Court will be the final arbiter; the supremacy of the Federal Government will be absolute, because its court will determine and control the situation. But it will not necessarily determine that either the State was without exclusive police jurisdiction or that the Federal Government was wanting in exclusive commerce power. It will simple decide whether the State regulation was a bona fide effort necessary to protect health or whether it was a sham or subterfuge really designed as a regulation of commerce.

That is all there is in it. No conflict can arise between efforts of both authorities to preserve health. The talk about conflict between Federal and State authorities proceeds from a distempered imagination. If it is the wish of Congress to assume as an incident to interstate and foreign commerce the entire burden and expense of protecting the country against contagion from abroad and from State to State, which I believe it is our duty to do, because the authority is implied by the commerce clause and for which the pending bill provides, I believe the proposed relief would be welcomed with glad acclaim by the people of every State subject to invasion. When the Federal Government demonstrates its disposition, as declared in this bill and indicated in former legislation, to protect the health of the people, it will inspire such confidence and impart such a sense of security as will induce all States to relax their own efforts as no longer necessary and do as my State has done, transfer its quarantine stations to the Federal Government and rely upon the efficiency and integrity of its officials for security against contagion and death.

If we desire to dispense with local efforts for the protection of health, it should not be by resort to offensive and unconstitutional methods, but we should assure the people by the beneficence of our regulations that their efforts are unnecessary; that as citizens of the United States the Federal Government, in its power, justice, and benevolence, will see to it that its magnificent commerce with foreign ports and its infinitely greater commerce throughout the splendid States of this glorious Union shall never bear contagion and death to its citizens and children whose exalted characters, achievements, and patriotism sustain and perpetuate the greatness and glory of this Republic. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] for the kind reference he has made to me in connection with my work in behalf of this bill on the committee. I confess that I am anxious to see a fair and reasonable quarantine law passed at once. In the limited time allowed me in which to discuss this important bill I shall attempt to avoid, as far as I can, entering upon a discusssion of abstract questions, nor do I desire to review the old battle ground over which the issues of strict construction, liberal construction, and implied powers of the Constitution have been fought over for the last hundred years. Sush a discussion or such a review will hardly instruct or entertain us in the consideration of the plain and simple terms of this bill as it came from the Interstate Commerce Commission practically with the approval of sixteen of the eighteen members.

I am aware of the great difficulties to be encountered in drawing the lines of demarcation between the rights of the States and the rights of the Federal Government upon many questions and upon many subjects. I think that it is especially difficult to define these lines in connection with quarantine as related to commerce. But however difficult it may be, there is one principle that can well guide us. It is this: That wherever we find the Federal Government exercising a power delegated by the State, then that authority is supreme. I take occasion to say here, now, that I do not believe that the results of the great civil war between the States of this Union impaired, injured, or destroyed one single positive reserved police right that the States had when hostilities began. [Applause.] I believe that the question settled by that mighty struggle was that the States had no right to secede from the Union of States and the question of chattel rights of property in slaves. I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe that the Congress can frame any quarantine law within the limits of the Constitution that clothe the Federal authorities with the supreme, exclusive right of quarantine in the maritime ports of our coast or within the States.

I yield to no man on this floor the palm of being more devoted to the real, true theory of the reserved positive rights of the States than I myself entertain and cherish. To ignore the police right of the State to preserve the health of its people, to punish criminals, and maintain order and peace is to shut one's eyes to the vital theory of our republican form of government. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is framed on that theory.

I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there are two spheres under this system of republican form of government, the one appertaining to the State and the other to the Federal Government. Each can move exclusively in its own sphere without conflict or interfering with the other. But, Mr. Speaker, I say the man who refuses to recognize the supreme and exclusive authority of the Federal Government when by an act of Congress Federal authorities are clothed with a power or authority which has been delegated by the States to the General Government makes as great a mistake as he does when he declares that the State, in the exercise of its police power for the protection of health, can trespass upon, obstruct, or usurp the unquestioned right of the Federal Government to direct and control interstate commerce.

Mr. Speaker, let us look at this bill. It is a plain, simple bill in all its provisions. I say there is not a paragraph, there is not a word in this bill, from beginning to end, that interferes or conflicts with the reserved police rights of the States to protect health. Not one in any way. The bill recognizes both the authority of the Government and the States. The bill in paragraph 1 declares that the Federal Government shall have control of only such quarantine stations, grounds, and anchorages as the Government establishes. That certainly is clear and can not be misunderstood by any on a search for the truth. Section 4 prohibits all other persons except State health or quarantine officers entering within the limits of quarantine grounds of the Federal Government. Section 5 of the bill provides that the Government may negotiate to purchase, if the State desires to sell, any quarantine station that the State controls at a port. Nothing is said about forcing the State to abandon its quarantine station. And the last section of the bill provides for cooperation between the States. And why, Mr. Speaker, does any man contend seriously that a State has a right to stand with an armed force on its border under the guise of protecting the health and interrupting interstate commerce?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; if the gentleman will be quick about it. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will ask you this question: Suppose a Federal officer certifies that the passengers on an interstate train are free from disease, gives it a certificate, arms the officers with it, and just as it arrives at the border of the State it transpires that there is yellow fever on the train. Let me ask you, Would your health officers have a right to detain that train for five days at a detention camp?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; the State has no right to do it. But under this bill the train with its passengers would pass through the State to its point of destination beyond the zone of fever.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is all I want the gentleman to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri who has just taken his seat has discussed the mosquito theory. Does the gentleman from Texas believe in the mosquito theory, as proclaimed by the scientists?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I think it is true.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then if you do, I want to read you what a man has said about it that you can worthily follow in protecting your own people of your own State—great as it is—and the people of the country. He said:

> If the medical fraternity and scientists, from whom we gather our views on these important matters, agree by reason of their researches that the mosquito is the sole method of propagating yellow fever, and that goods in transmission can not convey infection, and that individuals who have been declared immune after proper detention can not convey infection, then the question ceases to be one affecting the police powers of the States, and places the matter directly within the purview of the United States Government in its relation to the handling of interstate commerce.

Now, who said that? The Hon. JOSEPH W. BAILEY, the Senator from Texas, an able and distinguished Democrat, who so worthily represents in part the magnificent State of Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I know that the gentleman from Alabama does not want to convey the impression that Senator BAILEY would support section 7, for I know he would not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I want to convey the impression that that is what Senator BAILEY has said in his interview at New Orleans.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Does the gentleman from Alabama know that Senator Bailey has seen the report of that interview?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I understand that he denies it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE], I say I do not know whether Senator BAILEY has seen the published interview or not. I have seen no denial.

I fully concur in what Senator BAILEY says about the mosquito. If it be true that the mosquito is the medium of transmission of the virus of yellow fever, then your theory about police rights of the State being usurped and violated is exploded and "gone where the woodbine twineth." It is all in the air. Certainly you will not contend that the stegomyia fasciata mosquito confines herself to the limits of a State. She has no regard for the sacredness of State lines. It is a credit to Senator BAILEY that he illumined the whole subject through the mosquito with such splendid common sense.

I now refer, Mr. Speaker, to similar comments made by one of the leading newspapers of the States of the South interested and concerned in this subject of yellow fever, so vital to the Gulf States of the South. I refer to the Age-Herald, published at Birmingham, Ala. It says in a recent editorial when commenting on the provisions of section 7 of this bill, which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] denounces as destructive of all the police powers of the States for the protection of health:

> No believer in the mosquito theory can consistently oppose it, and no one who desires to get rid of shotgun quarantines will lift a hand against it. It will be remembered that Mississippi and Alabama kept interstate routes open last summer, while Texas closed its doors against all infected points. No harm arose over the Alabama and Mississippi policy, and none can arise, because the mosquito is now known to be a necessary intervening agent in the spreading of the disease.

I will refer now, Mr. Speaker, to an extract from another great newspaper, whose editor has had every opportunity to become acquainted with the ravages and horrors of the fearful epidemic of yellow fever. I refer to the Times-Democrat, of New Orleans. This great newspaper, in commenting on section 7 of the bill, which seems to draw the chief fire of the opponents of the bill, in a recent editorial, says:

> That the Richardson amendment is right in principle and sound in law no one can dispute. It was generally advocated at the Chattanooga quarantine convention, and has been called for earnestly by most of the southwestern papers. We had evidence last summer of the necessity of some provision to this effect, and the system of bottling up a State, section, or city pursued by Texas was found cruel in the extreme. Had Mississippi or Alabama followed its example in this matter there would have been more persons shut up in the infected towns, and, as a consequence, more cases of fever and more deaths. There were a number of towns in Louisiana and Mississippi which wanted to follow the Texas example, but Governor Vardaman prevented this in Mississippi, and the Louisiana State board of health finally succeeded in breaking up similar embargoes in this State.
> It will unquestionably be to the public advantage and greatly reduce the suffering and loss of life in an epidemic if a route is preserved for refugees to points outside the yellow-fever zone, and no one can dispute the right of the Federal Government, under the interstate-commerce clause, to keep open the highways of commerce and travel, due care being taken to assure protection from disease in cases where refugees are carried from an infected section through neighboring towns or States. Experience has shown this to be simple and easy, and in not a single instance did this transportation produce any infection or bad results.

I have taken the liberty of quoting from these two representative papers merely to present to the House the strong practical side to this question. This is worthy of our thoughtful consideration. When I reflect, Mr. Speaker, what an epidemic of yellow fever is to the South I confess I would be reluctant indeed to take any part of the responsibility of defeating a measure even promising relief. I do not mean to say that gentlemen ought to sacrifice their honest and sincere convictions as to what they believe to be the rights of the States. While giving these gentlemen who strenuously oppose the passage of this bill full credit for honesty and sincerity, yet I can not but be surprised when I hear these gentlemen assert so earnestly that this bill usurps, invades, and destroys the rights of the States in all matters of quarantine for the protection of the health of the people.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this bloody section 7 as described by the opponents to this bill and as it originally appeared in the bill—as it stands now—simply asserts the right that the Government has to run a through train, passing through the State, and not allowing or permitting anyone to leave that train or let freight be unloaded at any place in the State contrary to the health laws of the locality or State and bearing the certificate of a Federal health officer. Are you to pen the people up in the infected locality and not have any outlet of escape? That would be the result if the theories advocated by the opponents of this bill should prevail—the only hope of breaking up the lamentable shotgun policy so quickly and fearfully resorted to on the first alarm of yellow fever. I can not believe that anyone wants a continuation of that practice.

Now, I want to read and have gentlemen listen to what a great lawyer, a Senator who truly reflects the substantial solid principles of the rights of the States; a man who abounds with common sense and is looking to meet the great emergencies which the South has gone through in yellow fever epidemics, with the shot-gun policy, with anarchy prevailing in the different sections of the Gulf States. Listen to what he says:

The powers delegated to the Federal Government are supreme. It can protect any passenger or freight train going from one State into another, but if there is infection on either train the people at stations along the route are not compelled to allow the passengers to get off and mingle with its citizens or to receive the freight consigned to that locality. Here the peril appears and the State's authority springs into existence. But the people along the route have no right to detain the train or in any way to impede its progress to its destination. As a condition to passing through the locality, they have no right to cause the passengers to suffer any inconvenience, to be deprived of light and air; neither have they the right to prevent a passenger from going to his destination when it is necessary for him to go from one train to another. He has passed beyond State jurisdiction and is under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

In construing the reserved police powers of the State relative to its regulation of health, it must be remembered that citizens of the United States are citizens of every State, and that there is no expatriation in passing from one State to another and no naturalization is required in the change from one section to another. The rights which appear in national sovereignty are not possessed by them. They have not the capacity of an independent people. They are constituted in a form necessary to internal order and administration, and have none of the indices of power in which a nation appears in its external sovereignty, maintaining its own relations and acknowledging on earth no superior authority.

The construction of the meaning of the Constitution on the powers delegated and reserved should be such that neither shall be so isolated from the other as to become its opponent nor so subjected to another as to become its instrument. There should be no resort to special and temporary devices and contrivances by the one power to hinder and control the other.

In my opinion, if the Government takes charge of foreign and interstate quarantine, it will give confidence to the entire country. There will be no opposition to receiving freight anywhere if the certificate of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service accompanies it, nor will there be an objection to a person getting off of a train if he has a certificate stating that he has complied with conditions prescribed by the service. I believe that the confidence of the people everywhere will be so great in the Marine-Hospital Service that they will not be likely to invoke the exercise of the police powers of the State, and that local and unreasonable quarantines will be things of the past.

The present inhuman quarantine regulations suggest that in this enlightened age humanity in its full conception of the dignity and rights and respect for the person ought to be the guiding star in health legislation, and its energizing principles of right and duty should enter into legislation relative to quarantine.

That was said by a great southern judge who presided over the supreme court of the great State of Louisiana for years before he was sent to the Senate of the United States—Senator MCENERY. What broad and patriotic statesman sentiments are these uttered by Senator MCENERY, of Louisiana, in the speech he delivered at the opening of the new Real Estate Auction Exchange in New Orleans last October. It is truly refreshing to read such sentiments and contrast them with what we have heard expressed to-day by the opponents to this measure. Did Senator MCENERY think that the Federal Government had no right to exercise its prerogative of controlling interstate commerce? Now, I take pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in referring to what was recently said by a distinguished lawyer, who prides himself on adhering to the exclusive view of the rights of the States, but he also thinks that the Federal Government has some exclusive rights also which do not conflict with the rights of States.

I quote from an able speech made by Hon. Edgar H. Farrar, one of the most distinguished lawyers of the bar at New Orleans. The speech was made in 1898, and he quoted and discussed all the usual authorities relied on to show that the State was omnipotent in the exercise and enjoyment of its police powers. But since that speech was made New Orleans has suffered another visitation of the dreadful scourge. I quote now from a recent supplement that Mr. Farrar made to his 1898 speech:

If the States can not agree upon any settlement of the momentous question of quarantine on interstate commerce, and if the present unsatisfactory conditions are not rectified, it will, in my judgment, be the duty of the Congress to pass some stringent statute punishing any person, whether health officer or not, who shall unlawfully interfere with uninfected interstate trains and uninfected interstate passengers, passing through a State. No State has any power to block the highways of interstate commerce or to lay embargoes on interstate commerce under the pretense of exercising quarantine powers. That power can be lawfully exercised without any such harsh measures.

We have had a vicious recurrence of shotgun and military quarantines, with the consequent disturbance of traffic and transportation, and the usual accompaniment of inhumanity and brutality, begotten by ignorance and cowardice. We have had many instances of States and localities pressing their undoubted right of self-protection far beyond any reasonable or lawful ground for its exercise, and making their quarantines not merely affective of but regulative of interstate commerce, and in some instances actually prohibiting the passage of interstate trains and interstate passengers, under circumstances which rendered the conveyance or transmission of infection by them impossible. The consequence of all these illegal actions has been to create a widespread hatred of and disgust with the exercise of quarantine powers by the States, and out of this hatred and disgust has arisen a clamor for a national system of quarantine.

It would appear from these late utterances of Mr. Farrar that he would approve section 7 of this bill. That is the true doctrine, Mr. Speaker. No one is seeking to interfere with the rights of States. We are simply recognizing, as we ought to do, the supreme authority of the Federal Government where it is supreme. For the purpose of further comment on section 7 of the bill, I will read again that section:

SEC. 7. That every common carrier, engaged in interstate commerce, shall, under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into a State wherein delivery or debarkation may be lawful, all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service; and every person interfering with or obstructing such carrier or any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any such carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to debark or unload freight in any locality contrary to the lawful regulations thereof.

Really, Mr. Speaker, the reading of the section puts the opponents of the bill in the attitude of fighting at mere shadows—beating the air or sounding tom-toms.

I have not, Mr. Speaker, thought it was necessary to quote from the authorities to sustain the theory of this bill. I stated, Mr. Speaker, in the opening of my remarks, that it was difficult to draw the line of demarcation between the rights of the States in the matter of health as in connection with commerce, and the exclusive control the Government has over interstate commerce as connected with health. Senator SPOONER, in his report on the Senate bill (S. 2162) to increase the efficiency and change the name of the United States Marine-Hospital Service, July, 1902, made these very apt and forcible comments on this difficult subject:

But it is often very difficult of discernment, and therefore it has often happened that State authorities have felt their province invaded by Federal authorities, and Federal authorities have insisted that the national function was invaded by State authorities, and out of it all has grown more or less of friction, necessarily detrimental to great public interests. No statute, of course, can change the power of the Federal authorities as defined by the Constitution, or take away the sovereign power of any State in respect of these matters.

The committee has been impressed with the conviction that in the general public interest some recognition by Federal legislation of the State health authorities, in the way of consultation upon subjects of vital consequence to the localities, and as to the rules to be put in operation by both State and Federal authorities in accomplishing the same end, would of necessity bring about better understanding and a cooperation which would inevitably promote a fuller accomplishment of the great purpose desired by both the Federal and the State authorities.

When we remember that the transportation of passengers from foreign ports to our coasts is considered commerce and that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the transit of passengers on trains running through the States is identically the same thing as transporting of passengers from foreign ports, then I can not see why the authority of the Government is not as exclusive and supreme in the one as the other.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, quoted in United States Report 188, page 347, said:

The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the internal concerns which affect the States generally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government.

Apply that rule laid down by that great judge, and can anyone say that yellow fever does not belong to the "internal concerns" which affect the States generally? It spreads from State to State creating panic, anarchy, and prostration of all business and social relations.

In the same case Justice McLean said: "That the transportation of passengers is part of commerce is not now an open question."

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is in the nature of a declaratory bill, seeking to promote that cooperation strongly recommended by existing law. It is only by cooperation that uniformity of quarantine rules between the Federal and State authorities can ever be secured. When the quarantine rules of the States are in conformity with the rules of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, then the shotgun policy will disappear. I have no doubt that when the proper authorities of the States see that the Government officials are vigilant and efficient in preventing the introduction of yellow fever to our coasts from foreign ports that the States will cheerfully give over their stations to the Federal authorities. So we have every reason to believe when uniform rules for the discharge of persons exposed to the contagion are adopted by the States and the Federal health authorities that a man bearing a proper certificate can leave a train at any place in any State. That, in chief, is what this bill seeks to achieve.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I will divide whatever time I have left with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, those of us who oppose this bill base our opposition upon what we contend is a grant of unwarranted Federal power in section 7 of the pending substitute, which reads thus:

SEC. 7. That every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into a State wherein delivery or debarkation may be lawful, all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and every person interfering with or obstructing such carrier or any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any such carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to debark or unload freight in any locality contrary to the lawful regulations thereof.

That section provides that an interstate train of passengers or freight, or both, by virtue of the health certificate issued by the Federal authorities, can go through any State in the Union, and the authorities of that State not only have no right to inspect the train, to examine the freight or passengers, to determine, in the interests of the citizens of that State, whether there be disease present or not, but actually it is made a Federal offense, punishable by fine of $300 and imprisonment for one year, if they attempt to interfere with that train; and the only proviso to this vicious provision in this bill is that passengers can not alight and get off the train, nor can freight be put off.

Now, I take it that the solitary question raised by this section of the bill is this: Can the Federal Congress suspend the right of a State, through its health officials, to inspect either freight or passengers in a vessel entering the port of a State or freight and passengers on a train entering the borders of a State? I have not the slightest doubt, Mr. Speaker, under the authority of the Supreme Court in an unbroken line for nearly one hundred years, that this power thus attempted to be asserted in this section can not legally be exercised. I assert this proposition: That health laws are a part of the reserved, exclusive powers of the States, not conferred directly or indirectly upon any branch of the Federal Government, and that, independent of what Congress may say or do, the right unimpaired will still exist upon the part of a State to inspect and detain any train or vessel, whether it bears foreign or interstate commerce, and that that precise point has been settled times without number by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Speaker of this House said before the Union League Club of Philadelphia on February 16 of this year:

In my judgment, the danger now to us is not the weakening of the Federal Government, but rather the failure of the forty-five sovereign States to exercise, respectively, their function, their jurisdiction, touching all matters not granted to the Federal Government. This danger does not come from the desire of the Federal Government to grasp power not conferred by the Constitution, but rather from the desire of citizens of the respective States to cast upon the Federal Government the responsibility and duty that they should perform.

If the Federal Government continues to centralize, we will soon find that we will have a vast bureaucratic government, which will prove inefficient, if not corrupt.

I do not intend any reflection upon anyone in or out of this House, but these words of the Speaker and all the facts leading up to this legislation suggest the idea that one of the potent reasons for the desperate and unusual efforts to pass this bill is the desire to save expense to the States by Federal appropriations. Commercial forces, desiring uninterrupted trade, are "cooperating" with that idea, and hence but little attention is to be paid to the Constitution, for when did avarice, selfishness, and greed pay voluntary respect to law? What does the Constitution amount to between such friends as these? Let us examine this Federal power sought to be exercised by section 7 in the light of the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States. That profound lawyer, Chief Justice Taney, in 5 Howard, page 576, said:

It must be remembered that disease, pestilence, and pauperism are not subjects of commerce, although sometimes among its attendant evils. They are not things to be regulated or trafficked in, but to be prevented as far as human foresight or human means can guard against them.

The principle announced in these words is important, for no man who favors section 7 of this bill attempts to sustain it on any ground save that clause of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce, foreign and interstate. They contend that incident to the power thus expressly conferred is the right of Federal health laws which, as affecting either foreign or interstate commerce, are superior to the health law powers of any State. This we of the opposition deny and we indorse heartily the wise words of Mr. Justice Bradley in ex parte Siebold (100 U. S., p. 393):

The true interest of the people of this country requires that both the National and State governments should be allowed, without jealous interference on either side, to exercise all the powers which respectively belong to them, according to a fair and practical construction of the Constitution. State rights and the rights of the United States should be equally respected. Both are essential to the preservation of our liberties and the perpetuity of our institutions. But in endeavoring to vindicate the one, we should not allow our zeal to nullify or impair the other.

If any gentleman will take the trouble to examine that wonderfully able work of John Randolph Tucker upon the Constitution, he will find that he treats this whole question at length, from page 534 to page 537, and cites all the various authorities, and sums up in a breath and in a very clear statement just the particular bearing that the commerce clause of the Constitution has upon the police powers of the States, and vice versa. I read:

A vessel proposes to enter a harbor of a State under Congressional commercial regulations, and the State, to protect its people from disease, quarantines it. These two powers seem to conflict, but they do not, except as both operate upon the movement of the vessel, though from different sources of power. The vessel is subject to two powers which are entirely different, but not in conflict. It does not check a rightful object of commerce. It merely erects a bar against disease. Congress regulates the rightful object of commerce, under color of which it can not authorize wrongful commerce. It can not introduce disease, but may a rightful subject of commerce. The two powers are made to consist by restraining the State, under color of quarantine, from regulating rightful commerce, and restraining Congress, under color of commerce, from regulating the unlawful importation of disease.

In other words, there does exist the negative duty upon the Federal Government, under the interstate-commerce clause, not to introduce disease in the regulation of commerce, but it leaves intact and untouched by the Constitution the reserved right of a State affirmatively to act upon all commerce entering the borders of a State in the protection of the health of its citizens. This is the doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court decisions. In Gibbons v. Ogden, in 9 Wheaton, Chief Justice Marshall uses these words:

The exclusive authority of State legislatures over this subject is strikingly illustrated in the case of City of New York v. Miln. In that case the defendant was prosecuted for failing to comply with a statute of New York, which required of every master of a vessel arriving from a foreign port in that of New York City to report the names of all his passengers, with certain particulars of their age, occupation, last place of settlement, and place of their birth. It was argued that this act was an invasion of the exclusive right of Congress to regulate commerce. And it can not be denied that such a statute operated, at least indirectly, upon the commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and foreign countries. But notwithstanding this it was held to be an exercise of the police power properly within the control of the State, and unaffected by the clause of the Constitution which conferred upon Congress the right to regulate commerce.

In his concurring opinion in the same case, Mr. Justice Johnson said:

It is no objection to the existence of distinct, substantive powers that, in the application, they bear upon the same subject. The same bale of goods, the same cask of provisions, or the same ship that may be the subject of commercial regulation may also be the vehicle of disease. And the health laws that require them to be stopped and ventilated are no more intended as regulations on commerce than the laws which permit their importation are intended to inoculate the community with disease. Their different purposes mark the distinction between the powers brought into action, and while frankly exercised they can produce no serious collision.

The clear doctrine is that as to commercial regulation the power of the Federal Government is supreme; that as to the protection of the health of the people the police powers of the States are supreme. It is the duty of both courts and Congress to make these powers harmonize and subsist, each in their proper domain, and to see to it that neither impairs, suspends, nor destroys the other. This section 7 suspends, nullifies, destroys the police power of a State over an interstate train of passengers or freight, and hence invades the exclusive domain of the States.

In Gilman v. Philadelphia (70 U. S., p. 730) Mr. Justice Swayne, discussing the police powers of the States, said:

Under quarantine laws a vessel registered or enrolled and licensed may be stopped before entering her port of destination, or be afterwards removed and detained elsewhere, for an indefinite period; and a bale of goods upon which the duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under "health laws," and if it can not be purged of its poison may be committed to the flames.

The inconsistency between the powers of the States and the nation as thus exhibited is quite as great as in the case before us, but it does not necessarily involve collision or any other evil. None has hitherto been found to ensue. The public good is the end and aim of both.

If it be objected that the conclusion we have reached will arm the States with authority potent for evil, and liable to be abused, there are several answers worthy of consideration. The possible abuse of any power is no proof that it does not exist. Many abuses may arise in the legislation of the States which are wholly beyond the reach of the Government of the nation. The safeguard and remedy are to be found in the virtue and intelligence of the people. They can make and unmake constitutions and laws; and from that tribunal there is no appeal. If a State exercise unwisely the power here in question, the evil consequences will fall chiefly upon her own citizens. They have more at stake than the citizens of any other State. Hence, there is as little danger of the abuse of this power as of any other reserved to the States. Whenever it shall be exercised openly or covertly, for a purpose in conflict with the Constitution or laws of the United States, it will be within the power, and it will be the duty of this court to interpose with a vigor adequate to the correction of the evil.

In the same case Mr. Justice Wayne said:

That the States of the Union may, in the exercise of their police powers, pass quarantine and health laws interdicting vessels coming from foreign ports or ports within the United States from landing passengers and goods, describe the places and time for vessels to quarantine, and impose penalties upon persons for violating the same; and that such laws, though affecting commerce in its transit, are not regulations of commerce, prescribing terms upon which merchandise and persons shall be admitted into the ports of the United States, but precautionary regulations to prevent vessels engaged in commerce from introducing disease into the ports for which they are bound, and that the States may, in the exercise of such police power, without any violation of the power in Congress to regulate commerce, exact from the owner or consignee of a quarantined vessel, and from the passengers on board of her, such fees as will pay to the State the cost of their detention and of the purification of the vessel, cargo, and apparel of the persons on board.

It does seem, to my mind, that this language is as clear as can be and precisely in point.

In Patterson v. Kentucky (97 U. S., 505) Mr. Justice Harlan said:

We have frequently decided that the police power of the States was not surrendered when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States. Hence the States may, by police regulations, protect their people against the introduction within their respective limits of infected merchandise. A bale of goods upon which duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under health laws, and if it can not be purged of its poison, may be committed to the flames. So may the States by like regulations exclude from their midst not only convicts, paupers, idiots, lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, but animals having contagious diseases. This court has never hesitated, by the most rigid rules of construction, to guard the commercial power of Congress against encroachments in the form or under the guise of State regulations, established for the purpose and with the effect of destroying or impairing rights secured by the Constitution. It has, nevertheless, with marked distinctness and uniformity recognized the necessity, growing out of the fundamental conditions of civil society, of upholding State police regulations which were enacted in good faith, and had appropriate and direct connection with that protection to life, health, and property which each State owes to her citizens.

Who doubts that under this decision a State would have the right to inspect an interstate train of passengers or freight, or both, and in case infection was discovered to detain either and take such action as would be necessary to protect the health of its people?

Under this section 7 that can not be done, no matter what the State health authorities may be informed or suspect, if that train starts originally with a bill of health from the Federal authorities it could go through 900 miles of mosquito territory in Texas, and may have forty cases break out on the train, and the whole train may be reeking with disease, and the State authorities be absolutely powerless, under this section, to interfere. Nay, if they dared do it, they would be arraigned in a Federal court and prosecuted under a Federal offense. Talk to me about a Democrat, a believer in the reserved rights of the States, a believer in the enumerated granted powers of the Federal Government, standing for this sort of Federal regulation, which suspends the right of a State to even inspect a train of passengers or freight within its own territory, to determine for itself whether action be necessary to protect its citizens against disease! We have gone a long way toward turning over our internal affairs to the Federal Government. Men are clamoring on all sides to rush to the Federal Government to control insurance, to control interstate corporations, to control quarantine, and to control everything on the face of the earth at the expense of the Federal Treasury, but it seems impossible to me that any Democrat should have ever been willing to stand in this Chamber and openly defend section 7, in the face of all Democratic authority and judicial opinions from the foundation of this Government. [Applause.] Judge MacLean, in the Passenger cases (7 How., p. 400), said:

In giving the commercial power to Congress the States did not part with that power of self-preservation which must be inherent in every organized community. They may guard against the introduction of anything which may corrupt the morals or endanger the health or lives of their citizens.

Now, if you ask me what power the Federal Government has under the commerce clause, I say I am not discussing now what powers are vested by that provision, I am asserting whatever they are they do not include the right to suspend the health laws of the State; and whatever power Congress may have to regulate commerce the Supreme Court says it did not include the right to infringe upon, detract from, or in any manner affect the health laws of any State in the Union.

In the License cases Mr. Justice Grier, speaking of State health laws, said:

If the right to control these subjects be complete, unqualified, and exclusive in the State legislatures, no regulations of secondary importance can supersede or restrain their operation on any ground of prerogative or supremacy. The exigencies of the social compact require that such laws be executed before and above all others. It is for this reason that quarantine laws, which protect the public health, compel mere commercial relations to submit to their control. They restrain the liberty of the passengers; they operate on the ship, which is the instrument of commerce, and its officers and crew the agents of navigation. They seize infected cargo and cast it overboard. These things are done, not from any power which the States assume to regulate commerce or to interfere with the regulation of commerce, but because police laws for the preservation of health must of necessity have full and free operation.

In the same case Justice MacLean said:

The license acts of Massachusetts do not purport to be a regulation of commerce. They are police laws. Enactments similar in principle are common to all the States. * * * The acknowledged police power of a State extends often to the destruction of property. A nuisance may be abated. Everything prejudicial to the health or morals of a city may be removed. Merchandise from a port where a contagious disease prevails, being liable to communicate the disease, may be excluded; and in extreme cases it may be thrown into the sea. This comes in direct conflict with the regulation of commerce, and yet no one doubts the local power. It is a power essential to self-preservation and exists necessarily in every organized community. It is indeed the law of nature, and is possessed by man in his individual capacity. He may resist that which does him harm, whether he be assailed by an assassin or approached by poison. And it is the settled construction of every regulation of commerce that, under the sanction of its general laws, no person can introduce into a community malignant diseases, or anything which contaminates its morals or endangers its safety. And this is an acknowledged principle applicable to all general regulations. Individuals in the enjoyment of their own rights must be careful not to injure the rights of others.

From the explosive nature of gunpowder a city may exclude it. Now, this is an article of commerce, and is not known to carry infectious disease, yet to guard against a contingent injury a city may prohibit its introduction. These exceptions are always implied in commercial regulations, where the General Government is admitted to have exclusive power.

They are not regulations of commerce, but acts of self-preservation. And although they affect commerce to some extent, yet such effect is the result of the exercise of an undoubted power in the State.

In Railroad Company v. Husen (95 U. S., p. 465) Mr. Justice Strong, speaking for the court, says:

Neither the unlimited power of a State to tax, nor any of its large police powers, can be exercised to such an extent as to work a practical assumption of the power properly conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Many acts of a State may indeed affect commerce without amounting to a regulation of it in the constitutional sense of the term. And it is sometimes difficult to define the distinction between that which merely affects or influences and that which regulates or furnishes the rule for commerce. There is no such difficulty in the present case. While we unhesitatingly admit that a State may pass sanitary laws for the protection of life, liberty, health, or property within its borders; while it may prevent persons and animals suffering under contagious or infectious diseases, or convicts, etc., from entering the State; while for the purpose of self-protection it may establish quarantine and reasonable inspection laws, it may not interfere with transportation into or through the State beyond what is absolutely necessary for its self-protection. It may not under the cover of exerting its police powers substantially prohibit or burden either foreign or interstate commerce.

In that case the court annulled a Missouri statute, which, under the guise of a quarantine law, absolutely prohibited the bringing of Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle into the State from March to November, and made no distinction between those that were healthy and those that were diseased. In his lectures on the Constitution, Judge Miller reluctantly and guardedly admits that this law would have been valid if it had provided for the inspection of cattle at the State line, admitting the healthy and excluding the infected; and in Kimmish v. Ball (129 U. S., p. 221) the Husen case was so interpreted by a unanimous decision, in which Judge Miller, as a member of the court, took part.

Health laws are the States' right of self-defense, which can not be impaired or suspended by any act of Congress. Congress has the right to regulate commerce. Each of these powers are supreme in their sphere, and neither can be permitted to destroy the other. They can be and must be harmonized.

In Plumly v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., p. 461) Mr. Justice Harlan announces the right of a State to exclude from its limits "paupers, convicts, persons likely to become a public charge, and persons afflicted with contagious or infectious diseases," and then uses these significant words:

These and other like things having immediate connection with the health, morals, and safety of the people, may be done by the States in the exercise of the right of self-defense.

Section 7 destroys the "right of self-defense" of the States in the interest of transportation. Verily we are coming to think more of money than men!

The Supreme Court of the United States has several times since 1898 recognized the right of a State to pass and enforce proper health and quarantine laws affecting interstate and foreign commerce, and has reiterated the doctrine that all police powers were reserved to the States in the following cases: Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad v. Haber, 169 U. S., 613; L'Hote v. New Orleans, 177 U. S., 587; Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S., 349; Rasmussen v. Idaho, 181 U. S., 198; Smith v. St. Louis and Southwestern Rwy. Co., 181 U. S., 248; Compagnie Francaise, etc., v. Louisiana State Board of Health, 186 U. S., 380; Crossman v. Lurman, 192 U. S., 189.

In the L'Hote case, above, the court said:

It has been often said that the police power was not by the Federal Constitution transferred to the nation, but was reserved to the States, and that upon them rests the duty of so exercising it as to protect the public health and morals. While, of course, that power can not be exercised by the States in any way to infringe upon the powers expressly granted to Congress, yet until there is some invasion of Congressional power, or of private rights secured by the Constitution, the action of the States in this respect is beyond question in the courts of the nation.

That is the whole question, and if this Congress should attempt to say that Federal officials can arm and equip a train of passengers or freight so that it may go through your State, stop here and there to take water, stop here and there to take coal, or to oil the engine, and come into contact everywhere in the towns and villages where these things are with other citizens of the State, giving to this Stegomyia fasciata mosquito an opportunity to bite infected persons and scatter pestilence abroad, and still say to your health officers, "You can not inspect the passengers and freight and say whether infected mosquitoes are there, or there are infected passengers on board of the train," you may as well cease talking about the "rights of the States."

Those who favor this section attempt to defend it on the authority of three cases—Morgan v. Louisiana, 118 U. S., p. 464; Louisiana v. Texas, 176 U. S., p. 1, and Compagnie Francaise v. Board of Health, 186 U. S., p. 380. In the first case Judge Miller does say that—

Whenever Congress shall undertake to provide for the commercial cities of the United States a general system of quarantine, or shall confide the details of such a system to a national board of health, or to local boards, as may be found expedient, all State laws on the subject will be abrogated, at least so far as the two are inconsistent.

And substantially this new doctrine is approved in the other cases. A careful examination of these cases shows, however, that in each case this doctrine is obiter dicta, the point not being raised, argued, or necessary to the conclusion in either case. The doctrine so clearly set forth in the numerous cases cited, where the point was before the court, that the health laws of a State are a part of the reserved police powers of the States not granted to the Federal Government "exclusive" and absolute is not mentioned in either of the cases, much less called in question. Again, the first of these cases was prior to the case of Plumly v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., p. 461), which we submit is in point and disregards the Miller dictum in Morgan v. Louisiana. Again, we assert against this new, strange, and dangerous, if not damnable, doctrine that an inherent "right of self-defense" possessed, "reserved" by the States, can be abrogated by the extension of a "granted" Federal purely commercial power, that the ninth article of the amendments to the Constitution fixes a rule the very reverse of the contention in the dictum of these three cases. It reads thus:

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Now, then, if it be conceded that State health laws are a part of the reserved police powers of the States—and no opinion of the courts even intimates otherwise—then no such construction can be given to the commerce clause of the Constitution by Congress or the courts as will "deny" or "disparage" this right of self-defense reserved to the people of each State. This doctrine that in case a granted Federal power conflicts with a reserved State power the State power is abrogated is centralization gone mad. This ninth amendment fixes that question beyond controversy in either Congress or the courts, and cooperates with the tenth amendment to prevent the absorption by the Federal Government of a single reserved power of any of the States. All powers not delegated are reserved and none of those reserved can be denied or disparaged by those delegated. And there you are!

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I desire to give credit to that distinguished lawyer of the city of New Orleans, Edward H. Farrar, whose splendid address at Mobile some years ago on this very question has been of great value to me, the conclusion of which I quote:

The Congress, under the power to regulate commerce, can pass laws preventing the immigration of paupers, convicts, idiots, and insane persons. It is its duty to exercise all of its powers beneficially.

But it can not put its stamp on any such immigrant and say that no State, under its police power, shall prevent his landing and determine for itself whether he is a pauper, a convict, an idiot, or an insane person.

Under the same power the Congress may legislate to prevent the vehicles and objects of commerce from being the vehicles of pestilence, and may establish Federal quarantine stations for infected persons and ships, just as it establishes marine hospitals for sick and injured mariners.

But it can issue no bill of health to ship, passenger, crew, or cargo that will pass them through a State quarantine, in spite of and contrary to its lawful rules, any more than it can give a sick sailor a certificate of discharge from a marine hospital that will safeguard him from the jurisdiction of municipal health regulations.

It might, under the same power, organize a national board of health or a marine-hospital corps and give them authority over its quarantine stations and its regulations of commerce, and direct them to obtain information about infectious and contagious diseases at home and in foreign lands and ports, and to assist the State authorities in the execution of the State laws, but it can not make the authority of such persons paramount over that of State officers acting within the scope of their own valid powers.

It might by treaty or by statute provide in loading ports in foreign countries—a sphere entirely beyond the reach and authority of the individual States—a system of sanitary inspection and purification, but it could not provide that ships so treated, their cargoes, officers, crews, and passengers should thereby not come under the police and health authority of States whose ports they might enter.

But all of these exercises of authority do not grow out of the police or the quarantine power. They are not pitched upon any such ground. They are valid as regulations of commerce only, and not as health laws. Under the pretext of exercising its exclusive powers, the Congress can no more invade the reserved powers of the States than the States, under the pretext of exercising their reserved powers, can march within the domain of the exclusive powers of the Congress. This principle was clearly laid down in the quotation above made from Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in McCulloch v. Maryland, and was practically applied in the United States v. Dewitt (9 Wall., p. 41), where the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional an act of the Congress which undertook, as part of the internal-revenue laws, to make it a misdemeanor to mix for sale naphtha and illuminating oils, or to sell petroleum below a certain flash test. They said that such prohibition was a police regulation, solely within the powers of the States, and that it was not an appropriate and plainly adapted means for carrying into execution the power to levy and collect taxes. So that if the Congress, under the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, shall make regulations thereof, which are nothing more nor less than police and health regulations, the court must on the same principle declare them void.

Therefore the only way to legalize the regulations of commerce (above suggested) by the Congress is to regard them as not in substitution of, but in aid of State laws.

Each sovereign acts in its own separate and distinct sphere, and at the point where their powers come in contact they mutually adjust their legislation on each side of the line, so as to harmonize the workings of these powers and to promote the objects and end of government.

And the Congress has so interpreted its own powers in quarantine and health matters since the Federal Government was organized.

Yellow fever was epidemic in New York in 1793 and in Philadelphia in 1795. It was known to have been introduced by the vehicles and objects of foreign commerce. But the Congress undertook to pass no quarantine regulations. On the contrary, at that time, when the Federalists, the strong and broad government men, were at the height of their power, they contented themselves with the act of May 27, 1796, which authorizes the President to direct the revenue officers and those commanding forts and revenue cutters to aid in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of the States.

The yellow death again invaded the metropolis, and raged in New York during the summer of 1798 with uncommon violence and fatality.

When the Congress met in the fall, President Adams called attention to the infliction, and said:

"But when we reflect that this fatal disorder has, within a few years, made repeated ravages in some of our principal seaports, and with increased malignancy, and when we consider the magnitude of the evils arising from the interruption of public and private business, whereby the national interests are deeply affected, I think it my duty to invite the Legislature of the Union to examine the expediency of establishing suitable regulations in aid of the health laws of the respective States."

In response to this message the Congress passed the act of February 25, 1799, which declares that—

"The quarantine and other restraints established by the health laws of any State respecting any vessel arriving in or bound to any port or district thereof shall be duly observed by the officers of the customs of the United States, by the masters and crews of the several revenue cutters, and by the military officers commanding in any fort or station upon the seacoast; and all such officers of the United States shall faithfully aid in the execution of such quarantine and health laws, according to their respective powers and within their respective precincts, and as they shall be directed from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The statute makes sundry other provisions in aid of the State quarantine laws relative to the discharge of cargoes of vessels in quarantine, the erection of quarantine warehouses, the deposit of quarantined goods in warehouses or inclosures, and extending the time for entry of quarantined vessels.

For one hundred years less one this law has stood unchanged on the statute books of the United States, and stands there to-day.

During all these years invasion after invasion of epidemic pestilence has marched into the country through the seaports, scourging them, and, from them, the interior inhabitants; wave after wave of contagion has spread from State to State along all the avenues of communication and commerce, and yet no one has, until within a few years, thought of invoking the Federal power.

After the epidemic of 1878 the Congress went no further than to organize a national board of health and to declare that its duties "shall be to obtain information upon all matters affecting the public health, to advise the several departments of the Government, the executives of the several States, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia on all questions submitted by them, or whenever, in the opinion of the board, such advice may tend to the preservation and improvement of the public health." It was further authorized to make special examinations and investigations at any place in the United States, or at foreign ports, to aid in the promotion of the objects of the act. This was repealed by the act of February 15, 1893, but the Congress starved the board to death many years ago by refusing to make appropriations to support it. This was caused by the officious and meddlesome conduct of some of its members.

The last-named act (that of February 15, 1893) is generally cast on the lines of aid and assistance to State quarantine laws. It contains only one unconstitutional clause, and that makes the certificate of health given by the Federal quarantine officer admit a vessel, her crew, passengers, and cargo to any port in the United States named in the certificate.

I am informed that the officers of the United States have never attempted to enforce this provision.

Even if the power existed to establish a general quarantine system throughout the United States, as suggested by Judge Miller, covering interstate and foreign commerce, I do not believe that the people, after a century of self-government in this matter, would submit to being dominated by such regulations. A short experience with government by officials far removed from the sympathies, fears, and necessities of each locality, in such a tremendous matter as the health of the community, would, in my judgment, lead to the repeal of such laws in a whirlwind of public discontent and indignation.

The people of the United States are and ought to be passionately attached to local self-government. It is the outcome of an organic race instinct. Upon that corner stone their institutions are built, and woe be to them when that foundation is disturbed!

Mr. WANGER. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, if I understood the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] a few moments ago aright, I agree with him that the civil war did not change the Constitution of the United States either as to States rights or anything else. That war, however, settled that this was a union of States, and that it was constitutional to preserve the Constitution and the Union. The Constitution, however, seems sometimes to be regarded here as a flexible instrument. On yesterday on the other side of the House there was a universal agreement, I think, to ignore all State rights principles, and to hold that it was constitutional and not a violation of States rights at all to fix a rule by a law of Congress for the recovery of damages in suits between an employee and an interstate railroad company, or to fix a rule, regardless of State statutes or the common law, as to contributory negligence in all damage suits arising in any of the States against such railroad companies, or to set aside all contracts, regardless of their character, between employees and said railroad companies affecting the companies' liability; and that it was also no infringement of States rights to legislate so that all damage suits arising in the States against interstate railroad companies might be transferred, as existing law requires where a Federal law is involved, at the instance of the companies for trial to the United States courts, which in most cases would result in a denial of justice. To-day the other side of this House differ among themselves as to the constitutional power of Congress to legislate with reference to quarantining at our already established coast quarantine stations, some of them holding Congress may constitutionally legislate on the subject, others that only the States have such power. As to that, I am in no trouble; and I believe the power undertaken to be given by the present bill, if it should become a law, is constitutional, and I will have no trouble in voting for the bill on that account.

I will not speak of the particular details of this bill. I have some doubt about whether it is drawn to cover all that ought to be specified in it with reference to the methods of stamping out the disease of yellow fever. The bill itself seems to recognize yellow fever as the only dangerous infectious disease liable to come to our shores. It provides in the first section that vessels may be brought to "quarantine grounds, stations, and anchorages," saying that "whereat or whereto infected vessels having on board any person having yellow fever, bound for any port in the United States, may be detained or sent for the purpose of being disinfected, having their cargoes disinfected and discharged, if necessary, and their sick treated in hospitals until all danger of infection or contagion from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, or crews has been removed."

The disinfecting of a ship save for the purpose of destroying mosquitoes of a dangerous variety, and the disinfecting of ships' cargoes is wholly useless in the prevention of the spread of yellow fever.

The bill does not seem to cover the case of an infected ship at all, unless it is carrying a person suffering from the disease; and if the bill should become a law and be technically applied it would be ineffective in that respect.

But this idea of merely disinfecting a ship or cargo is altogether behind the times. Disinfection of a ship or the freight of a ship is the most perfect folly in the light of the latest discoveries that we could engage in at this time to prevent or stamp out yellow fever. It is conceded everywhere that the disease of yellow fever is never imparted by contact with a yellow-fever patient or with his clothing or in any of the ways that it was formerly believed the disease could be communicated. At Camp Lazear, 4 miles from Habana, yellow-fever patients were put in rooms, thoroughly screened from the variety of mosquito called "Stegomyia fasciata," and with them were put persons free from the disease. They were kept there day after day, and in no instance did the disease break out among any of them, whereas in the experiments that went on there in 1900 and 1901 persons bitten by the mosquito that had bitten the yellow-fever patient within a proper period after the patient became diseased always came down with the disease.

What was accomplished in Cuba in the interest of medical science and for the benefit of the human race deserves to be told here. I regret my own inability to give the full history of the steps taken, discoveries made, and results attained by the learned, heroic, and self-sacrificing surgeons of our Army in discovering the only way the disease of yellow fever may be communicated, and then the successful efforts they inaugurated to effectually stamp out the disease in Cuba. The medical and scientific world now accept unreservedly the theory that yellow fever can only be communicated by a single variety of the mosquito—Stegomyia fasciata. This variety of mosquito must have access to a person suffering with yellow fever during the first three of four days of the disease, then about twelve days must elapse before the mosquito can impart the disease to a healthy person. It is provided by nature with an inner tube-like instrument through which the deadly virus is injected into the human body while it sucks the blood. It follows that to destroy this mosquito or to prevent its coming in contact with a yellow-fever patient puts an end to the spread of the disease. Both methods of putting an end to the disease were adopted in Cuba and most successfully.

Little less than a miracle was worked. Cuba, the continuous home of yellow fever for above one hundred and fifty years, became free from the disease in 1901, the last case in Cuba having its origin there occurred on September 20, 1901. Cuba then remained immune from the disease for four years, when it was introduced there again in September, 1905, from New Orleans, but the epidemic was by the former heroic methods stamped out in three months, and Cuba is now free from the dread disease. Mere fumigation of ships, cargoes, and clothing did not and could not accomplish this result.

When it seemed that malarial fever was caused by an animal parasite transmitted from one person to another by a mosquito, a theory arose that in some way the mosquito conveyed the unknown cause of yellow fever. Dr. Carlos Finlay, of Habana, advanced this theory, but he did not succeed in demonstrating its truth. Prior to this a somewhat generally accepted theory was that of Doctor Sanarelli, who claimed that a bacillus discovered by him was the true agent of the disease. After the close of the Spanish war, the United States still holding some sort of military occupancy at Habana, Maj. Walter Reed, of the United States Army, was sent to Cuba in June, 1900, as president of a board to study the infectious diseases common there, but especially yellow fever. Associated with him were Acting Asst. Surgs. James Carroll, Jesse W. Lazear, and A. Agramonte. These distinguished gentlemen found that the improved sanitary conditions at Habana had diminished the general diseases and mortality of that city and the other Cuban towns, but they also found that yellow fever had been wholly unaffected by any sanitary measures that had been adopted. The presence of non-immune foreigners from the United States and elsewhere had caused a severe recurrence of the disease. This board of surgeons went to work under these discouraging conditions. They were seconded and materially aided by Lieut. Col. Valery Havard and by Majors Jefferson R. Kean and W. C. Gorgas, eminent surgeons of the United States Army who had served with United States troops in Cuba during our occupancy of the Island. They, too, had, by contact with the disease and their treatment of it, become imbued with theories as to the true nature and causes of the disease which became valuable in the investigations and demonstrations about to be made. For instance, it had been generally noted that when a soldier had gone from a camp outside of the city of Habana to the city, and there become inoculated with the disease of yellow fever which developed in him while occupying and sleeping with half a dozen or more of his comrades, the disease was not directly communicated to them. Such yellow-fever patients were removed and their comrades did not take the disease. This suggested that the old theory of the communicable infectious character of the disease was not sound; that some other agency must exist.

Major Reed, in association with a Doctor Carroll, had demonstrated that the bacillus icteroides, discovered by Doctor Sanarelli, was widely disseminated in the United States and was without any special relation to yellow fever. With this theory out of the way actual experiments were made which can not be described here. New buildings for the purpose of isolation and of screening yellow-fever patients were erected near Quemadas, a most favorable place and near enough to Habana to take advantage of developments there. Victims for experimentation were required. Volunteers from our Army fearlessly came forward offering themselves a sacrifice, if necessary, to the cause of science. Major Kean (my chief surgeon of division in the Spanish war) had already suffered from an attack of yellow fever. Doctor Carroll allowed himself to be bitten by a mosquito that had twelve days previously sucked the blood of a yellow-fever patient. He suffered from a severe attack of the disease, but recovered. Twice Doctor Lazear experimented on himself, the second experiment bringing on the disease causing his death—a martyr to science. Did ever hero die more patriotically for man or country?

There were other victims. Science never guesses; so actual demonstration was necessary. The details of the years of experiments can not here be given, intensely interesting as they are, but the principal conclusions reached by the board are now accepted throughout the scientific world. They are:

1. The specific agent in the causation of yellow fever exists in the blood of a patient for the first three days of his attack, after which time he ceases to be a menace to the health of others.

2. A mosquito of a single species, Stegomyia fasciata, ingesting the blood of a patient during this infective period is powerless to convey the disease to another person by its bite until about twelve days have elapsed, but can do so thereafter for an indefinite period, probably during the remainder of its life.

3. The disease can not in nature be spread in any other way than by the bite of the previously infected Stegomyia. Articles used and soiled by patients do not carry infection.

Special boards of several of the leading countries of Europe after long investigation found nothing to add or detract from the above summarized conclusions.

Major Reed lived to make this report and long enough to witness yellow fever disappear from Cuba and to know that the result of his and others work in the interest of science and humanity was accepted by the world, though he died November 23, 1902, a victim of appendicitis. He did not live long enough to receive the deserved official reward for his great services which the Secretary of War recommended. I quote here from the report of Hon. Elihu Root, Secretary of War, for the year 1902, to show his appreciation of the great work accomplished by the medical officers mentioned:

Especial credit is due also to the Medical Department of the Army, and particularly to Maj. Walter Reed and Maj. William C. Gorgas for their extraordinary service in ridding the island of yellow fever, described in my last report; and to Jefferson R. Kean and Dr. James Carroll for their share in that work.

The brilliant character of this scientific achievement, its inestimable value to mankind, the saving of thousands of lives, and the deliverance of the Atlantic seacoast from constant apprehension, demand special recognition from the Government of the United States.

Doctor Reed is the ranking major in the Medical Department and within a few months will by operation of law become lieutenant-colonel. I ask that the President be authorized to appoint him Assistant Surgeon-General with the rank of colonel, and to appoint Major Gorgas Deputy Surgeon-General with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and that the respective numbers in those grades in the Medical Department be increased accordingly during the period for which they hold office.

The name of Dr. Jesse W. Lazear, contract surgeon, who voluntarily permitted himself to be inoculated with the yellow-fever germ in order to furnish the necessary experimental test in the course of the investigation, and who died of the disease, should be written in the list of the martyrs who have died in the cause of humanity. As a slight memorial of his heroism a battery in the coast-defense fortification at Fort Howard, Baltimore, Md., has been named "Battery Lazear."

Maj. W. C. Gorgas, chief sanitary officer in Habana, in February, 1901, with others, some of whom I have named, instituted the necessary measures to extinguish the disease of yellow fever naturally suggested by the report of the distinguished board. In general the disease-communicating mosquito was either exterminated or the yellow-fever patient was isolated from it, and the result was the disease disappeared from Habana in ninety days and from Cuba as already stated, and can only again exist there by reintroduction from the outside. Cuba was without yellow fever for two hundred and fifty years after discovery by Columbus; it then existed continuously for about one hundred and fifty years; then American heroes of medical science discovered its character and the agency of its transmission, and then conquered the disease by preventing its further spread in the island.

I have related this much of the history of recent discoveries relating to yellow fever to enable me to say again that mere quarantine of a ship at the Dry Tortugas, or its cargo, will have little to do with preventing the spread of the disease of yellow fever. A quarantine station may, however, be necessary there and elsewhere for ships with yellow-fever patients aboard, and the Marine-Hospital Service may safely be intrusted to inaugurate, through their accomplished, trained, and experienced medical officers, together with those of the Army and Navy who may become participants in the work, such proper and efficient methods to secure an effectual extermination of the disease of yellow fever as they may know to be best. The road to success in preventing or exterminating yellow fever is now too plainly blazed not to be followed, and successfully, by the distinguished medical staffs who will be in charge.

The bill, though imperfect in the respect pointed out, should become a law rather than leave our borders unprotected, as they now seem to be, from the introduction of the disease from Mexico, Central America, or other infected regions.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to consume the remainder of his time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the substitute bill which we are now discussing probably presents one of the most important questions that the Congress of the United States for many years has been called upon to consider. It is the first instance in the history of over one hundred years when Congress has undertaken to deviate from the course adopted in 1798, which was suggested by the then President of the United States, Mr. Adams, a Federalist. The American people are furnished to-day with the spectacle which the House presents in the solution of this question and the determination of this issue of the Representatives of the States, for the first time, undertaking to destroy the police powers of the States by a Federal law; and that, too, at the instigation and on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Democratic leader. On the 6th of March, when it was suggested by Mr. GARDNER, from Massachusetts, that the minority leader was a member of the Committee on Rules, the following colloquy occurred in the House:

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Harness, so far as I know, are not manufactured in my district, and I know nothing about the conditions of the trade. I will say this, however, that if a rule were introduced by the Committee on Rules, of which the gentleman from Mississippi is a member——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nominally, nominally. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Of which the gentleman from Mississippi is, at all events nominally, a member and sometimes invited to the meetings, I presume——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am invited to the séances, but never consulted about the spiritualistic appearances. [Laughter.]

But to-day, instead of being a nominal member of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman is an active member of that committee. He has abandoned his opposition to the tyranny of the Republican code of rules, and has invoked those same rules to-day in order to stifle and throttle his own friends and party associates on this side, and to leave only a short time for the discussion of this important question, involving not only the life of the States, but eventually the life of the Republic itself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not yield. I have only twenty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only wanted to say——

Mr. BARTLETT. I decline to yield, and I appeal to the Chair to protect me from interruption.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman said he would not discuss the rule—that is all—and he has purposely thrown me off my guard.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say so. Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Speaker to protect me from the intrusion of the gentleman from Mississippi. He is aware of the courtesies and amenities of debate, as well as anyone, and he should be compelled to preserve them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I decline to yield. Mr. Speaker, I am as courteous as anybody; but when I am throttled and muzzled by the gentleman from Mississippi, it does not lie in his mouth to complain when I decline to yield.

The gentleman from Mississippi also said he was sometimes "invited to the séances of the Republican Committee on Rules, but never consulted about the spiritualistic appearances."

The gentleman has now been converted into a happy medium for the promulgation of Republican rules by which the House has throttled his own party associates. For myself I am content with the situation and the result, if the gentleman from Mississippi is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say this is one of the most important bills that ever the House was called upon to consider. The gentleman was kind enough to refer to the report of the minority members of that committee, drafted by myself, and concurred in by that able lawyer, my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL], and he said that anybody who would have contended for anything else would have been a fool.

If section 7, as advocated by the gentleman from Mississippi, both in the original substitute and in the substitute for the substitute as reported by the committee, is not an attempt to overthrow and destroy the rights of the State to exercise and control its own police regulations, then I will not say that a man who can not see it is a fool. I will not use the very delicate and refined language of the gentleman from Mississippi, but I will say that the gentleman who does not see it in that way does not view it, in my judgment, as he should under the rules of construction and under the definition given to police powers by all the law writers of the land and by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, we may, as we are entitled to, and some men may, as they are entitled to, reach to a high position by reason of great ability and learning, aided thereto by the admiration and respect which their fellows and friends have for them, but no man can occupy so exalted a position as will authorize him to designate a statement made by honorable gentlemen his equals, at least, in all things, except possibly in experience and in education; I say no man, no matter what may be his position, learning, or ability, is justified in designating a gentleman a fool because he does not agree with him. That is the narrowest partisanship, the shallowest kind of criticism that any gentleman could make.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield for me to make an apology?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Georgia has totally misunderstood what I said. I said that anybody that did not agree with the gentleman's report would have been a fool; that nobody but a fool would have doubted his position. I never said that the gentleman was a fool.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, the gentleman from Mississippi has demonstrated by his advocacy of the measure, as he has to-day, that he might be in danger of falling within the category that he has designated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman is losing his temper.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I am not losing my temper. I am willing to discuss this bill. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi was the author of this original bill, prepared at the suggestion and at the request of the Representatives from the Southern and Gulf States after a full conference on the subject. He introduced it and it was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] introduced a similar bill in the Senate, and I say to him and to the country that I will vote word for word for the bill that the gentleman from Mississippi himself is the author of. I will vote to-day, word for word, for the bill introduced by Senator MALLORY, that passed the Senate on yesterday.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does not the gentleman know that the bill introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi prohibited——

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I know what the gentleman refers to, and that is one of the reasons I favored it, because the gentleman from Mississippi put in the bill that he was the father of a provision that would protect the rights of the State from invasion, even if a ship or cargo had received the certificate of the health officer of the United States, and prevent it from entering the States against the laws of the States. I prefer it because the people where I come from instructed me to vote for that sort of a bill. I say I want to support the measure introduced by my friend from Mississippi. But when the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and the Republican members of that committee get control of it; when these gentlemen, who do not agree with the political principles which we have been taught to revere upon the old-fashioned theory, upon which I have often in this House undertaken to stand with the gentleman from Mississippi, sometimes alone—when these gentlemen get hold of it they make an entirely different bill, change it into an exclusive Federal quarantine bill, and destroy the powers of the States; therefore I oppose it. It was not long ago that I stood with the gentleman from Mississippi upon the broad constitutional ground that Congress had no right to charter a canal through the States, authorizing the corporation to condemn the property of the citizens of the States. I voted with him against such a bill, though it was admitted to be of great national importance. I can not now, because, forsooth, there is involved in this bill the alleged purpose to destroy the yellow fever, scourge that it is, become a coward and run away from the issue.

Now, I want to read what the gentleman from Alabama, who favors the substitute, said on the floor of this House on the 19th day of December, 1905. He is referring to national quarantine:

Why, Mr. Chairman, the statement of the proposition itself is enough to cause this House of Representatives to pause and think well before we enact any legislation on that line.

Farther on he said:

In the trail or wake of the appalling and dreadful epidemic of yellow fever in the South there is a great clamor made for Federal control. No man could take his stand on the floor of this House who is more eager and anxious to forever banish that dreaded disease and plague from the shores of the South than am I; but rather than sacrifice one of the fundamental rights of my State, or its domestic and local control of one of its reserved powers, I would be willing to fight the yellow fever for ages to come. We are encouraged to believe that under the advance of science it will not be long before we will be free from this scourge. Many public men express the opinion that we want Federal control. They do not stop to consider the far-reaching effects of such a proposition.

That is what they are after here; they want Federal control, and they do not stop to consider the far-reaching effect of such a proposition. My friend from Alabama does not stop now to even consider the far-reaching proposition contained in this substitute, especially in section 7.

If this bill passes, the State and local boards of health will have no further authority in the matter of interstate quarantine, or quarantine at the ports. Of this I think there can be no doubt should the Supreme Court uphold the constitutionality of the bill. In this view I am sustained by the Secretary of the Treasury. In a letter the Secretary says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 13, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. BARTLETT: Replying to your letter of March 10, making certain inquiries concerning the effect of H. R. 14316, "A bill to further enlarge the powers and authority of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service," and asking especially whether the bill in effect enlarges the authority of the Treasury Department in the matter of the spread of contagious diseases, I beg to say:

The bill directs the establishment of a quarantine station and anchorage at the group of islands known as the Dry Tortugas. This can not be done under the authority now vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, and it is a question of some doubt in my mind whether it ought to be done. It is but 75 miles from Key West, where there is a large and fully equipped quarantine station.

If the Department were clothed with plenary authority, as proposed in the bill, and charged with ultimate responsibility, and given adequate appropriations, it is possible that the importation of yellow fever might be more effectually prevented. There is nothing in the bill, however, giving larger authority or calculated to encourage greater vigilance after a contagious disease has actually broken out.

There is possibly one other advantage in the bill. It is possible now for local authorities to interfere with the passage of boats and railroads from one town to another, and especially between points in different States. Jurisdiction in matters of this kind is transferred to the Federal Government. Should the bill pass, local boards of health will have no authority in the premises.

You will recognize in effect the bill proposes to place upon the General Government the responsibility of policing our entire coast and frontier for the prevention and spread of contagious diseases, and relieves, so far as may be, local authorities from responsibility in the premises. In the very nature of the case it is a step in a direction which will ultimately result in a very large and expensive Federal supervision.

Yours, very truly, L. M. SHAW.

Hon. C. L. BARTLETT,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama rose.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would not do my friend an injustice.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I know the gentleman would not knowingly. Why does he not read this other part of my speech? I am going to suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. BARTLETT. Because the gentleman voted to throttle me; because he has tied my hands; because he has only given me twenty minutes to discuss a question that requires an hour.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But I did not get any time myself.

Mr. BARTLETT. All right; go ahead.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Here is what I said on that subject: "The position that I take"—and I read from the same speech as that—"is that I concede there is no violation of the reserved rights of the States"——

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, I will put that in my remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. "In this proposition, that the Federal Government controls quarantine so as to prevent the importation of disease"——

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, don't read any more.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. "From foreign countries, or the spread of disease from one State to the other"——

Mr. BARTLETT. I will put that in my remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. "By so doing the Government is but exercising its constitutional function."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that gentleman insists upon interrupting me. I can not yield any more to anyone. But I say another thing, and the gentleman can correct it to-morrow in the RECORD. He stated in that speech that we did not want any more quarantine law; that the Federal authority had exhausted its power to pass a Federal quarantine law, and if I did not read it, now I apologize for it. Here is what it says:

"That, Mr. Chairman, the Government is doing to-day, and I contend that under the present law the Government has clothed the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service with all the authority and power that Congress is authorized under the Constitution to give."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield any more. I can not do it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But just one word——

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I can not do it. I will not do it. There is the speech. These gentlemen throttle us and then undertake to consume our time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But I did not mean to do that.

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I take it back, then. There is the speech made on the 19th day of December, which is a repetition of that great and glorious doctrine that my friend from Alabama was the gallant champion of at the Chattanooga conference. He said—and I thought once I would incorporate it in the minority report—that Congress had exhausted its power, and has given to the Marine-Hospital Service all the authority it can give under the Constitution. Yet not content with that, he undertakes to arm the Marine-Hospital Service with further power that is remarkable and extraordinary. They first put in the first substitute, that if any governor or mayor or State or municipal health officer should undertake to arrest or stop a plague-laden train or a smallpox-laden train passing through the State, the governor and health officer of the State should be arrested and tried and convicted in the Federal courts and punished, and my colleague and friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who was opposed to this section 7 in the first substitute, hugs the delusion to his soul that he has changed it in the last substitute, that by juggling words merely. I apprehend there is not another member of that committee, not a Member of this House, and I know there is not another member of that Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who contends that the words with which they undertake to change section 7 in the substituted substitute mean anything less than they do in the original section 7. I will now yield time to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] to say whether I am correct or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Georgia for yielding me some time, but when he asked me the question whether there is any difference——

Mr. BARTLETT. In effect, I say.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Between section 7 and the original as drawn by myself—and I still stand by and adhere to the principles set forth in section 7, because I believe it is the law under the Constitution, and the substitute for section 7 only changes it not in principle——

Mr. BARTLETT. That is all I wanted the gentleman to admit, and I will not yield any more.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It changes it in phraseology.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But I want to ask my friend some more.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I decline to yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, I think the gentleman ought to allow——

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, go ahead and say it, then.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I believe that the gentleman said in that minority report that he indorsed the Chattanooga conference.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not, and the gentleman can not find it there—no, sir. Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that it looks as if somebody else were lacking in gray matter besides the two gentlemen who signed the minority views, if we are going to put it to the test the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests.

Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss this question from a legal standpoint, but I have not the time. I would like to make an argument compiled from these cases, which I have referred to in the views of the minority, but I have not the time. There has not been a deviation or a turning of the Supreme Court from the doctrine that every reasonable State police law or regulation for the protection of the health of the people, must be sustained though they in some way may affect commerce. I could read from the opinions of judges of the courts from the earliest days, from 4 Wheaton down to 192 and 198 United States, where the courts have steadily upheld the doctrine that the State did not give up to the General Government its right to control and regulate its own local affairs by police laws, and the day is far away, and I trust will never come, when the General Government shall undertake to control the health laws of the States upon the pretext that yellow fever or plague or smallpox are commerce. Why, to quote the language of Chief Justice Marshall, quoted so often, and reiterated in Brown v. Maryland, the States even as against imported goods upon which the duty has been paid have the right to take the goods if they are infected or if they have been exposed to disease and tear them to pieces and burn them up in order to protect life and health of its citizens.

THE RIGHT OF THE STATE TO ENACT QUARANTINE LAWS.

I will now call attention to some of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States from which I am justified in saying that a reasonable exercise of the police power of the State has always been upheld by that court, even though the State laws may have affected or interfered with interstate commerce. The first case is the one so often quoted, decided by Chief Justice Marshall.

In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton, p. 203), the Chief Justice, in rendering the decision, says:

> That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce will not be denied, but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived can not be admitted. The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country; to fit them for exportation, or, it may be, for domestic use. They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce or of commerce among the States and prepare it for that purpose. They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, or which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, etc., are component parts of this mass.
> No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation. If the legislative power of the Union can reach them, it must be for national purposes; it must be where the power is expressly given for a special purpose or is clearly incidental to some power which is expressly given. It is obvious that the Government of the Union in the exercise of its express powers—that, for example, of regulating commerce with foreign nations and among the States—may use means that may also be employed by a State in the exercise of its acknowledged powers—that, for example, of regulating commerce within the State.
> If Congress licenses vessels to sail from one port to another in the same State, the act is supposed to be, necessarily, incidental to the power expressly granted to Congress and implies no claim of a direct power to regulate the purely internal commerce of a State or to act directly on its system of police. So if a State, in passing laws on subjects acknowledged to be within its control and with a view to those subjects, shall adopt a measure of the same character with one which Congress may adopt, it does not derive its authority from the particular power which has been granted, but from some other which remains with the State and may be executed by the same means. All experience shows that the same measures, or measures scarcely distinguishable from each other, may flow from distinct powers; but this does not prove that the powers themselves are identical. Although the means used in their execution may sometimes approach each other so nearly as to be confounded, there are other situations in which they are sufficiently distinct to establish their individuality.
> In our complex system, presenting the rare and difficult scheme of one General Government, whose action extends over the whole, but which possesses only certain enumerated powers, and of numerous State governments, which retain and exercise all powers not delegated to the Union, contests respecting power must arise. Were it even otherwise, the measures taken by the respective governments to execute their acknowledged powers, would often be of the same description and might sometimes interfere. This, however, does not prove that the one is exercising, or has a right to exercise, the powers of the other.

In Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., 419–433), Chief Justice Marshall recognized that the removal or destruction of infectious or unsound articles was undoubtedly an exercise of the police power of the State, and an exception to the prohibition resulting from the exclusive power of Congress to regulate the operations of foreign and interstate commerce, and that laws of the United States expressly sanction the health laws of the several States. In the License cases (5 Howard, 504, 576), Chief Justice Taney declared that "it must be remembered that disease, pestilence, and pauperism are not subjects of commerce, although sometimes among the attendant evils. They are not things to be regulated or trafficked in, but to be prevented as far as human foresight or human means can guard against them."

The headnotes to the case of Mayor, etc., of New York v. Miln, clearly and succinctly states the doctrine for which I contend—

> That a State has the same undeniable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits as any foreign nation, where that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States.
> That by virtue of this, it is not only the right, but the bounden and solemn duty of a State to advance the safety, happiness, and prosperity of its people, and to provide for its general welfare by any and every act of legislation, which it may deem to be conducive to these ends, where the power over the particular or the manner of its exercise is not surrendered or restrained in the manner just stated.
> That all these powers which relate merely to a municipal legislation, or what may perhaps more properly be called internal police, are not thus surrendered or restrained; and that, consequently, in relation to these, the authority of a State is complete, unqualified, and exclusive. (11 Peters, p. 133.)

In the case of Gilman v. Philadelphia (70 U. S. (3 Wall.), pp. 730–731) Justice Swayne, delivering the opinion of the court and discussing the police powers of the States under the quarantine laws, said:

Under quarantine laws a vessel registered or enrolled and licensed may be stopped before entering her port of destination, or be afterwards removed and detained elsewhere, for an indefinite period; and a bale of goods upon which the duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under "health laws," and if it can not be purged of its poison may be committed to the flames.

The inconsistency between the powers of the States and the nation as thus exhibited is quite as great as in the case before us, but it does not necessarily involve collision or any other evil. None has hitherto been found to ensue. The public good is the end and aim of both.

If it be objected that the conclusion we have reached will arm the States with authority potent for evil, and liable to be abused, there are several answers worthy of consideration. The possible abuse of any power is no proof that it does not exist. Many abuses may arise in the legislation of the States which are wholly beyond the reach of the Government of the nation. The safeguard and remedy are to be found in the virtue and intelligence of the people. They can make and unmake constitutions and laws; and from that tribunal there is no appeal. If a State exercise unwisely the power here in question, the evil consequences will fall chiefly upon her own citizens. They have more at stake than the citizens of any other State. Hence, there is as little danger of the abuse of this power as of any other reserved to the States. Whenever it shall be exercised openly or covertly, for a purpose in conflict with the Constitution or laws of the United States, it will be within the power, and it will be the duty of this court to interpose with a vigor adequate to the correction of the evil.

In the case of Smith v. Turner and Norris v. The City of Boston, known as the "Passenger cases" (7 Howard, 400), Justice MacLean said:

In giving the commercial power to Congress, the States did not part with that power of self-preservation which must be inherent in every organized community. They may guard against the introduction of anything which may corrupt the morals or endanger the health or lives of their citizens. Quarantine or health laws have been passed by the States, and regulations of police for their protection and welfare.

In the same case Justice Wayne said:

That the States of the Union may, in the exercise of their police powers, pass quarantine and health laws interdicting vessels coming from foreign ports or ports within the United States from landing passengers and goods, describe the places and time for vessels to quarantine, and impose penalties upon persons for violating the same; and that such laws, though affecting commerce in its transit, are not regulations of commerce, prescribing terms upon which merchandise and persons shall be admitted into the ports of the United States, but precautionary regulations to prevent vessels engaged in commerce from introducing disease into the ports for which they are bound, and that the States may, in the exercise of such police power, without any violation of the power in Congress to regulate commerce, exact from the owner or consignee of a quarantined vessel, and from the passengers on board of her, such fees as will pay to the State the cost of their detention and of the purification of the vessel, cargo, and apparel of the persons on board.

In the case of Patterson v. Kentucky (97 U. S., 505) Justice Harlan, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

We have frequently decided that the police power of the States was not surrendered when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States. Hence the States may, by police regulations, protect their people against the introduction within their respective limits of infected merchandise.

A bale of goods upon which duties have or have not been paid, laden with infection, may be seized under health laws, and if it can not be purged of its poison, may be committed to the flames. So may the States by like regulations exclude from their midst not only convicts, paupers, idiots, lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, but animals having contagious diseases. This court has never hesitated, by the most rigid rules of construction, to guard the commercial power of Congress against encroachments in the form or under the guise of State regulations established for the purpose and with the effect of destroying or impairing rights secured by the Constitution. It has, nevertheless, with marked distinctness and uniformity, recognized the necessity, growing out of the fundamental conditions of civil society, of upholding State police regulations which were enacted in good faith and had appropriate and direct connection with that protection to life, health, and property which each State owes to her citizens.

POWER OF A STATE TO EXCLUDE FROM ITS BORDERS PERSONS OR ANIMALS DANGEROUS TO THE HEALTH OF ITS CITIZENS.

In giving the commercial power to Congress the States did not part with that power of self-preservation which must be inherent in every organized community. They may guard against the introduction of anything which may corrupt the morals or endanger the health or lives of their citizens. Quarantine or health laws have been passed by the States and regulations of police made for their protection and welfare. (Vol. 8, Federal Statutes Annotated, p. 440 (Calvert); Smith v. Turner (1849), 7 Howard (U. S.), 400.)

In the exercise of the police power to adopt precautionary regulations to prevent vessels engaged in commerce from introducing disease into the ports to which they are bound a State may, without any violation of the power of Congress to regulate commerce, exact from the owner or consignee of a quarantined vessel and from the passengers on board of her such fees as will pay to the State the cost of their detention and of the purification of the vessel, cargo, and apparel of the persons on board. (Vol. 8, Federal Statutes Annotated, p. 443 (Calvert); Norris v. Boston (1849), 7 Howard (U. S.), 414.)

In the case of Railroad v. Husen, 95 United States, 465, Judge Strong said:

The police power would justify the exclusion of property dangerous to the property of the citizens of the State; for example, animals having contagious or infectious diseases. All these exertions of power are in the immediate connection with the protection of persons and property against obnoxious acts of other persons or such a use of property as is injurious to the property of others. They are self-defensive.

He further unhesitatingly admits that—

A State may pass sanitary laws and laws for the protection of life, liberty, health, and property within its borders, and it may prevent persons and animals suffering from contagious diseases from entering the State, and for the purpose of self-protection it may establish quarantine and reasonable inspection laws. (59 Am. Rep., 267–269.)

In the case of Robbins v. Taxing District (120 U. S., 489) Judge Bradley said:

It is also an established principle that the only way in which commerce between the States can be legitimately affected by a State law is when by virtue of its police powers and its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits a State provides for the security of the lives, limbs, health, and comfort of persons and the protection of property, or when it does those things which may otherwise incidentally affect commerce, such as the establishment and regulation of highways, canals, railroads, wharves, ferries, and other communal facilities, the passage of inspection laws, to secure the due quality and measure of products and commodities, the passage of laws to regulate or restrict the sale of articles deemed injurious to health or morals of the community, the imposition of taxes upon persons residing within the State or belonging to its population, and upon avocations or employments pursued therein not directly connected with foreign or interstate commerce.

It follows from these views, which are supported by many other adjudications, both State and national, that the quarantine regulations of a State must be sustained when they may fairly be deemed to fall within its police power, and, furthermore, that the cases when they can be adjudged not to fall within it must be of an extreme character and of rare occurrence. This is a very general and comprehensive power, including within it the adoption and enforcement of such laws as may fairly be deemed to have been designed in good faith for the promotion of the public welfare and which are not in direct conflict with some constitutional limitation. (New York v. Miln, 11 Pet., 132.)

While the National Government has reserved to itself the right to regulate commerce, it does not follow that every State law which to some extent affects or regulates commerce must be disregarded as in conflict with the paramount national authority. The regulation may be with reference to a subject-matter concerning which the national authority has not deemed it proper to act, in which case, though the State action may properly be designated as a regulation of commerce, yet it will be allowed to stand. Thus, in the leading case upon this topic, the quarantine laws of the State of Louisiana were assailed because they required all vessels passing designated stations to submit to an examination by State officials, and to pay a fee therefor, and it was insisted that this was necessarily a regulation of commerce and an imposition of tonnage duties. The Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding the cause, commented upon the quarantine laws of the State and affirmed their propriety and necessity, and that the fee complained of "is not a tonnage tax within the true meaning of that word as used in the Constitution, but is a compensation for services rendered as part of the quarantine system of all countries to the vessel which receives the certificate that declares it free from further regulations." As to the supposed invalidity of the law because it operated as a regulation of commerce, the court said:

Is the law under consideration void as a regulation of commerce? Undoubtedly it is in some sense a regulation of commerce. It arrests a vessel on a voyage which may have been a long one. It may affect commerce among the States when the vessel is coming from other States of the Union than Louisiana, and it may affect commerce with foreign nations when the vessel arrested comes from a foreign port. This interruption of the voyage may be for days or for weeks. It extends to the vessel, the cargo, the officers and seamen, and the passengers. In so far as it provides a rule by which this power is exercised, it can not be denied that it regulates commerce. We do not think it necessary to enter into the inquiry whether, notwithstanding this, it is to be classed among those police powers which were retained by the States as exclusively their own, and therefore not ceded to Congress. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1–210; New Orleans Gas Co. v. La. Light Co., 115 U. S., 650, 661; Henderson v. Mayor, 92 U. S., 259, 272.)

But aside from this, quarantine laws belong to that class of State legislation which, whether passed with intent to regulate commerce or not, must be admitted to have that effect, and which are valid. The matter is one in which the rules that should govern it may in many respects be different in different localities, and for that reason be better understood and more wisely established by the local authorities. The practice which would control a quarantine station on the Mississippi River, a hundred miles from the sea, may be widely and wisely different from that which is best for the harbor of New York. In this respect the case falls within the principle which governed the cases of Willson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet., 245; Cooly v. Board of Wardens, 12 How., 299; Gillman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 713, 727; Pound v. Turk, 95 U. S., 459, 462; Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S., 485, 488; Packet Co. v. Catlettsburg, 105 U. S., 559, 562; Transportation Co. v. Parkersburg, 107 U. S., 691, 702; Escanaba Co. v. Chicago, 107 U. S., 678; Morgan Steamship Co. v. La. Board of Health, 118 U. S., 455; Passenger Cases, 7 How., 283. Therefore it must be conceded that a quarantine law will not be declared void because its effect may, to some extent, be a regulation of commerce with foreign nations or among the several States. (Minneapolis, etc., Rwy., v. Milner, 57 Fed. Rep., 276; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 713.)

It may not, under cover of extending its police powers, substantially prohibit or burden either foreign or interstate commerce.

The court referred to and in effect overruled a decision of the supreme court of Illinois upon the same subject, saying:

We have not overlooked the decisions of very respectable courts in Illinois, where statutes similar to the one we have now before us have been sustained (Yeazel v. Alexander, 58 Ill., 254.) Regarding the statutes as mere police regulations, intended to protect domestic cattle against infectious disease, those courts have refused to inquire whether the prohibition did not extend beyond the danger to be apprehended, and whether, therefore, the statutes were not something more than exertions of police power. That inquiry, they have said, was for the legislature and not for the courts. With this we can not concur. The police power of a State can not obstruct foreign commerce or interstate commerce beyond the necessity for its exercise; and, under color of it, objects not within its scope can not be secured at the expense of the protection afforded by the Federal Constitution. And as its range sometimes comes very near to the field committed by the Constitution to Congress, it is the duty of the courts to guard vigilantly against any needless intrusion. (Railroad v. Husen, 95 U. S., 465–473.)

We think, however, that there is little or no doubt of the correctness of the subsequent decision of the supreme court of Missouri affirming that the State has authority to provide reasonable regulations prescribing the mode of transportation of diseased or infected animals through the State and restricting the manner of such transportation so as to prevent the spread of disease or contagion, and we even doubt the concession made by that court that the State is without power to forbid the transportation through it of live stock then so diseased or infected as to probably prove injurious to the health of other live stock within the State. (Grimes v. Eddy, 126 Mo., 168; Kimmish v. Ball., 129 U. S., 217.)

So, as shown by the court in the principal cases, the State authorities may provide for the inspection and disinfection of the baggage and personal effects of travelers coming from infected ports or places in other States or in a foreign country, and may place such restraints upon such travelers in the nature of quarantine regulations as due regard for the health and safety of the citizens of the States may reasonably dictate.

QUARANTINE LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

It can not be disputed that Congress has from the beginning avoided any conflict between State and national authority by, in effect, adopting the State laws and regulations, and directing the officers and agents of the General Government to aid in their enforcement. (Story on the Constitution, sec. 1075; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 205; Lockwood v. Bartlett, 130 N. Y., 340.)

Thus section 4792 of the Revised Statutes of the United States declares that—

The quarantine and other restraints established by the health laws of any State, respecting any vessels arriving in or bound to any port or district thereof, shall be duly observed by the officers of the customs revenue of the United States, by the masters and crews of the several revenue cutters, and by the military forces commanding in any fort or station upon the seacoast; and all such officers of the United States shall faithfully aid in the execution of such quarantine and health laws, according to their respective powers and within their respective precincts, and as they shall be directed, from time to time, by the Secretary of the Treasury. But nothing in this title shall enable any State to collect a duty of tonnage or impost without the consent of Congress.

The succeeding section enacts that whenever, by the health laws of any State or by the regulations made pursuant thereto, any vessel arriving within a collection district of such State is prohibited from coming to the port of entry or delivery by law established for such district, and such health laws require or permit the cargo of the vessel to be unladen at some other place within or near to such district, the collector, after due report to him of the whole of such cargo, may grant his warrant or permit for the unlading or discharge thereof under the care of the surveyor or one or more inspectors at some other place where such health laws permit, and upon the conditions and restrictions which shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, or which such collector may for the time deem expedient for the security of the public revenue.

By the statute of April 29, 1878, it was declared that—

No vessel or vehicle coming from any foreign port or country where any contagious or infectious disease may exist, and no vessel or vehicle containing any person or persons, merchandise, or animals affected with any infectious or contagious disease, shall enter any port of the United States or pass the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country contrary to the quarantine laws of any one of said United States in or through the jurisdiction of which such vessel or vehicle may pass or to which it is destined, and except in the manner and subject to the regulations to be prescribed as hereinafter provided.

This statute further provided that—

Whenever an infectious or contagious disease shall appear in any foreign port or country, and whenever any vessel shall leave an infected foreign port, or have on board goods or passengers coming from any port or district infected with cholera or yellow fever bound for any port in the United States, the consular officer or other representative of the United States at or nearest such foreign port shall give notice thereof to the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service, and to the health officer of the port of destination in the United States, and that the Surgeon-General shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be charged with the execution of the provisions of the act, and shall frame all needful rules and regulations for that purpose, subject to the approval of the President, but that such rules or regulations shall not conflict with or impair any sanitary or quarantine laws or regulations of any State or municipal authority now existing or which may hereafter be enacted; and that at all ports where, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it shall be necessary to establish quarantine, the medical officers or other agents of the Marine-Hospital Service shall perform such duties in the enforcement of the quarantine laws and regulations as may be assigned by the Surgeon-General of that Service: Provided, That there shall be no interference in any manner with any quarantine laws or regulations as they may now exist or may hereafter be adopted by State laws.

Other statutes were enacted by Congress establishing a National Board of Health and relating to contagious diseases, but their operation was restricted to four years from and after their passage. (See 20 U. S. Stats., 484; 21 U. S. Stats., 5, 46.)

By chapter 453 of the statutes of 1882 the duties of the Board of Health were restricted to the diseases of cholera, smallpox, and yellow fever. (22 U. S. Stats., 315.)

By the act of August 30, 1890, the importation of cattle, sheep, or other ruminants and swine which had been exposed to any disease was prohibited, and the Secretary of Agriculture was authorized to place and retain in quarantine all such ruminants and swine at such ports as he might designate and upon such conditions as he might by regulation prescribe, and the importation of any such animals into the United States at any other port was forbidden; and the President, whenever in his opinion it should be necessary for the protection of animals in the United States against infectious or contagious diseases, was authorized by proclamation to suspend the importation of all or any class of animals for a limited time, during which the importation of such animals should be unlawful. (26 U. S. Stats., 416.)

On February 15, 1893, was enacted another statute, granting additional quarantine powers and imposing additional duties upon the Marine-Hospital Service, making it unlawful for any vessel from any foreign port to enter any port of the United States except in accordance with the regulations prescribed by the act, among which was that the vessel should be required to obtain from an officer of the United States at the port of its departure a bill of health in the form prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service was also authorized to examine the quarantine regulations of all State and municipal boards of health, and, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cooperate with and aid State and municipal boards of health in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations of such boards and of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury to prevent the introduction of infectious or contagious diseases into the United States from foreign countries or into one State or Territory or the District of Columbia from another State or Territory or the District of Columbia; and when, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, the quarantine regulations of the State or Territory or municipality were not sufficient to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States or the State or Territory or District, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to make additional rules and regulations to prevent such introduction; that when such rules and regulations had been made and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, if the State or municipal authorities should refuse or fail to enforce them, the President should execute and enforce the same, and adopt such measures as, in his judgment, should prevent the introduction and spread of such diseases, and should detail officers for that purpose.

The President was further given authority, if he should deem it necessary, to prevent the introduction of cholera or other infectious or contagious diseases from a foreign country, to wholly prohibit the introduction of persons and property from such countries and places as he should designate, and for such period of time as he shall deem necessary. (27 U. S. Stat., 449–452.)

By reference to these laws it will be seen that the present laws afford ample protection to the people from the introduction and spread of diseases either through the ports or from one State to another. No additional legislation is needed.

Mr. Speaker, if it shall turn out, as is desired and predicted by the advocates of this substitute, that the Supreme Court of the United States will sustain such legislation by reversing all of its former rulings, then will the States be shorn entirely of any power to regulate and govern their own affairs. Then will all power be centralized in the General Government, and the State governments will be but governments in name only. "Then indeed has centralization triumphed, and the American idea of the sovereign States is but a memory of a past generation."

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have not time to complete what I desired to say, but I will conclude by saying that I shall not join in promoting the march of this federalistic juggernaut aided by its friends as well as by its foes, to crush the life out of the remaining reserved rights of the States. They may crush them out to-day by this bill, but as sure as right lives and God reigns, the justice and the right of these principles which have been consecrated to us by our fathers and sustained by the courts will live; though crucified now, and that too with the assistance of those who have heretofore professed to be friends and apostles, they shall not perish, for there will yet come an Easter morn and a resurrection clear and bright to proclaim to our people and our children that will come after us that "government by the people, for the people, and of the people," as enunciated by the Declaration of Independence, as written in the blood of our forefathers and consecrated in the pages of the Constitution, shall not perish from the face of the earth. [Applause.]

I shall offer the following amendment after section 8 as a new section:

Nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the right of the State or municipality to protect its citizens from infectious, contagious, or epedemic diseases by such reasonable rules or regulations as the authorities of said State or municipality may deem necessary.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate gentlemen upon that side of the House for the contributions they have made this afternoon to its amusement, and I would like to call the attention of the country, if I could, to this exhibition we have had here to-day of "the Constitution of the United States in the hands of its friends." [Applause.] The great trouble with gentlemen over there in their attempt to administer government is that they have never believed that the Government of the United States had any power. They have never done anything when they were in power because they did not believe that under the Constitution of the United States they had the power to do it [applause on the Republican side], and that is one of the great follies of their attempting to administer a great Government like this. It has been so from the earliest times. The great besetment of their party has at all periods been their unwillingness to believe that under the Constitution this Government of ours had power to do anything. In the earlier days, when it was proposed to do something in a national way for the betterment of the people, the early patriots of Democratic persuasion always threw up their hands, as does the gentleman from Georgia to-day, and said, "Ah, this is unconstitutional." A national bank was unconstitutional. "You have no power under the Constitution to establish a great fiscal agent or a system of tariff for the protection of American labor. Ah, no," say these gentlemen, "you have no power under the Federal Government to do anything of that kind." In the early days, when they sought to build roads, highways, and canals in the interest of commerce, the Democratic party always was ready to say, "There is no power under the Constitution to do that." Even up to forty-odd years ago, when there was rebellion threatened and it was proposed to restore by force, if necessary, the relations of the States, the same class of gentlemen said, "No; there is no power under the Constitution to coerce a seceding State," and so it has been all the way through. Whenever a great enterprise, a great measure to push forward the car of progress, to make the nation great, this body, strict constructionists, has always held back, and said, "No; there is no power under the Constituition to so act."

Some gentlemen have passed beyond that; some have gotten so far that they can say that the Government of the United States has the power to protect their farms from inundation by an expenditure from the common Treasury. Some of them have gotten so far as to say that there is power under the Constitution to appropriate the whole public domain for the purpose of reclaiming their arid lands, and even gentlemen from Texas have gone so far as to conclude that that power now rests with the Federal Government. But when you come to a proposition like this to protect the commerce of the United States from the assaults of violence; when it is proposed to protect the trains bearing the commerce of the United States passing through a State—engaged in interstate commerce—from the assaults of the quarantine officers, or of a mob in Podunk, or some other insignificant town, gentlemen say, "There is no power lodged in the Federal Government," and that the proposition to so legislate inaugurates the most solemn hour that the nation has ever yet witnessed. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, what is this proposition that excites so the fears of gentlemen from Texas and from Georgia? It is simply this:

That every common carrier engaged in interstate commerce shall, under such regulations, restrictions, and safeguards as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, receive, carry, and transport, through any State or Territory necessary to complete the journey or carriage into a State wherein delivery or debarkation may be lawful, all passengers, freight, or baggage which may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, and every person interfering with or obstructing such carrier or any passenger or any instrumentality of commerce in any such carriage or journey shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as giving authority to any person to debark or unload freight in any locality contrary to the lawful regulations thereof.

And the enactment of that seemingly harmless statute, the gentleman from Georgia states, creates this solemn occasion, to which he invokes the kindly care of Deity. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, to my mind this opposition is simply ridiculous; there is nothing valid in it; it simply indicates that some gentlemen have been asleep for the last forty-five years, and are just now awakening; have not yet rubbed the sleep from their eyes; have not noticed the progress of events; have not noticed even the decisions of our Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court has settled this matter beyond peradventure. It says, in the case of Louisiana v. Texas:

While it is true that the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the States is a power complete in itself, acknowledging no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution, and that where the action of the States in the exercise of their reserve powers come into conflict with it it alone must give way, yet it is also true that quarantine laws belong to that class of State legislation which is to be allowed until displaced by Congress, and that such legislation has been expressly recognized by the laws of the United States almost from the beginning of the Government.

No one doubts the power of the State to legislate upon the subject of quarantine until the Government of the United States legislates, and whenever it does, whenever it asserts its authority, whenever it exercises its undoubted right that it possesses, then the statutes of the State that contravene or are in antagonism are void. That is the ruling of the Supreme Court; that is the status of the law. The Government of the United States heretofore, in the earlier periods of the Government, failing to legislate, failing to exercise its authority, gave to the States authority to act until it should exercise authority latent within it.

Now, what is the necessity of this legislation? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], with that kindliness that often characterizes him, suggests that some railroad company has done this thing. I do not know where this section originated. I know where it was first presented to me. It was by some of my friends in the committee who are not of my political faith. It is their preparation. They were content with it, and I think wisely so, recognizing the necessity for it. I have been told by a gentleman now near to me that last summer he started upon a train engaged in interstate commerce to travel from his home to a northern city; that he came to the borders of the State of Arkansas and there by force was stopped from the prosecution of his journey. The train was not permitted to cross the frontier of Arkansas. It was turned back, and by circuitous routes at last reached its destination. I am told by another gentleman that in 1897 there was almost war between the State of Louisiana and the State of Mississippi; that by force men in Mississippi attempted to interrupt the interstate commerce of the United States, insisting that they had a right so to do. The newspapers last summer brought us the intelligence that for a period of seven weeks the trains crossing eastward from Texas were not permitted to go on their journey. Somewhere in their route they were stopped. By whom? By the local authorities of the State engaged in their health protection under their quarantine laws.

Section 7 is the only one that excites the antagonism of our friends from Texas and from Georgia. They are in favor of the appropriation. The only section that excites their wrath is directed toward the prevention of this kind of interference with interstate commerce. We have tried to throw such protection around it that in the exercise of this right no possible harm could come to the people along the line of routes that are to be used by these trains.

Mr. Speaker, I was unwilling to make this appropriation without a provision that would secure this recognition of the rights of interstate commerce. I would vote against this bill if the seventh section was stricken out of it. I was willing to compromise in this way. I knew there were certain gentlemen who were not willing, but would prefer that there should be this specific recognition of this right of the Federal Government in the statute, and I am willing to vote for the bill as a whole, but I am not willing, nor will I support the bill with the seventh section eliminated. It ought to be there. It is a wholesome declaration for the protection of the great interest of commerce of the United States; and therefore I hope that there will be no toleration of the purpose to eliminate this wholesome section from its position in the bill. [Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time for general debate having expired, under the special order, the Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proposed substitute and insert the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the control, direction, and management of all quarantine stations, grounds, and anchorages established by authority of the United States, and as soon as practicable after the approval of this act shall select and designate such suitable places for them and establish the same at such points on or near the seacoast of the United States as in his judgment are best suited for the same and necessary to prevent the introduction of yellow fever into the United States, and, in his discretion, he may also establish at the group of islands known as the Dry Tortugas, at the western end of the Florida reef, and at such other point or points on or near the seacoast of the United States (not to exceed four in the aggregate) as he deems necessary, quarantine grounds, stations, and anchorages, whereat or whereto infected vessels having on board any person with yellow fever and bound for any port in the United States may be detained or sent for the purpose of being disinfected, having their cargoes disinfected and discharged, if necessary, and their sick treated in hospitals until all danger of infection or contagion from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, or crews has been removed."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether under the terms of the rule this substitute is subject to amendment at the end of each paragraph, or at the end of the reading of the substitute?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that under the rule at the end of each section it would be subject to amendment, and, further, under the terms of the rule, it seems to the Chair that an amendment that is germane would be in order to any section of the bill at any time, or to the whole bill at any time, at the completion of the reading.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer this amendment to line 9, page 1: After the word "States" insert "or the border of the United States and a foreign country."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to amend the substitute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To amend the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, in line 9, after "States," insert "or the border of the United States and a foreign country."

[Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a word to what the gentleman from Alabama has said.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi wish to oppose the amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, Mr. Speaker; I am in favor of it.

Mr. DE ARMOND rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri wish to oppose the amendment?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, one of the minor and incidental objections to this bill—although it may not be sufficient to lead one to vote against it—is the inevitable multiplication of officers and the greatly increased expenditure of money, the limit of which no one can fix.

This amendment will tend largely to increase expenses without tending in a material sense to lessen the danger of yellow fever. The yellow fever might get in across the Texas line; there is no doubt, however, but that Texas would look after that. If the Government has to establish quarantine stations along all the line of territory that borders upon Mexico, the amount of expense incident to it and the multiplication of officers will be very great, and the corresponding advantage, if there be any, will be comparatively small. So far as that danger is concerned, it will be looked after by Texas and from Texas. The difference between a quarantine station on the coast line and on the land line is very great. The distinction may easily be seen. If you are to properly police the land line you enter upon a big job, one which the Government ought not to undertake needlessly, with the great temptation to multiply officials and do very little good. This amendment will tend to lessen the merit of the bill rather than to increase it. It will increase taxation and expenditure without any corresponding benefit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to add one word in reenforcement of what the gentleman from Alabama has said in behalf of the amendment. Under the existing law the establishment of quarantine stations is a matter discretionary altogether with the Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Corps. He has construed his discretion to mean that he would not establish a quarantine except where he was freely furnished with the site.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] informs us of the fact, which happens not to be true in the light of history, that all we have got to do is to leave Texas alone and she will protect us. I have myself been through two yellow-fever epidemics in the city of Memphis, where both epidemics came through the State of Texas, so I am not certain that the State of Texas can be absolutely and altogether relied upon any more than Louisiana or any other State. I prefer two governmental guards to one and that one of them shall be the Federal guard. But without going into that I am no more certain of the State of Texas than I am of the State of Louisiana, and my last summer's experience taught that nobody was certain at all that the health authorities of the State of Louisiana, who were considering local conditions and local trade and convenience of their neighbors more than they were the welfare of the women and children of Mississippi and Arkansas, could be relied upon to keep out the fever. Gentlemen say that for one hundred and seventeen years the States have "coped with" the fever. It would be more accurate, historically, to say that for one hundred and seventeen years they had failed to cope with it. It is their proven inadequacy that has bred the demand for this very legislation.

This bill made it mandatory upon the Surgeon-General to establish quarantine stations at points along the seacoast, but it does not make it mandatory upon him to "establish such quarantine stations"—to use the language of the bill—"as in his judgment are best suited and necessary to prevent the introduction of yellow fever" on the land borders between ourselves and a foreign country. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is to make this mandatory provision applicable not only to the seacoast, but to the land boundary between ourselves and foreign countries from which yellow fever can come, countries in which yellow fever is bred. Mexico is one of these countries. Yellow fever was at Vera Cruz, and came thence through Texas to Shreveport, La., and from Shreveport to Memphis, Tenn., and did not strike New Orleans. It seems to me the bill ought to be uniform and ought to be adaptable to the border as well as the seacoast.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman what year he says the yellow fever came up there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In 1873 was when it came from Shreveport to Memphis and from Mexico and Texas.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me to add to that answer? In 1903 it was introduced by railroad passengers from Monterey. There were 1,230 cases and 135 deaths.

Mr. BURLESON. And Texas took care of those.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but Texas let in, too.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it competent at this time to offer an amendment to any part of the bill not yet read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to move to strike out section 8 of the bill, the section carrying the appropriation for this service.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is in order.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield? Before section 8 is read I would like to have read for information an amendment that I have to offer to that section.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to have it read for information.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields for the purpose of permitting the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to offer an amendment to be considered as pending.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, this may be done at this time. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the proposed substitute a new section to read as follows:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with the right of any State or municipality to protect its citizens from infectious, contagious, or epidemic diseases by such reasonable rules or regulations as the authorities of said State or municipality may deem necessary."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, in offering the amendment to strike out section 8, I do so not in any spirit of hostility to the bill. I am in favor of the bill and will vote for it with or without the amendment. I offer the amendment for the reason that this House is not in possession of information or facts upon which to base an intelligent judgment as to the amount necessary to be appropriated for the service which the bill authorizes. There has not been submitted to any committee of the House any estimate of the approximate cost of this quarantine service. There has been no investigation into that feature of the bill whatever, and before appropriating any money for this service an opportunity should be given for such investigation. We have now pending in this House and on the Union Calendar twenty bills that create a new Federal service. These bills carry appropriations amounting in the aggregate to almost $10,000,000. Like the appropriation now under consideration, none of them has received any consideration. This is but natural, because they come from committees that are not specially concerned either in the amount of the aggregate appropriations or in the amount of any specific appropriation carried in the bills which they report. The practice of allowing every committee of this House reporting bills creating a charge upon the Treasury to report in such bills appropriations to meet that charge without investigation is vicious and should be stopped. I have here a statement just obtained from the Surgeon-General's Office, which shows that on July 1, 1905, there was an available balance at the disposal of the Marine-Hospital Service of $331,470.69. On January 31, 1906, there was an available balance of $168,891.36, and that is in addition to the $340,000 appropriated for the maintenance of the Service during the current fiscal year. The expenditures during the first seven months of the fiscal year covering the period of the yellow-fever epidemic at New Orleans averaged a monthly expenditure of $23,225. The probable expenditures, as the Surgeon-General's Office informs me, for February and March have been $30,000, leaving an available balance for the remainder of the fiscal year of $138,891, or an average of $46,297 for each of the remaining three months of this fiscal year. Now, in view of the fact that no one can determine or ascertain with any degree of certainty the amount of money necessary to carry on the service under this bill until it is passed and becomes a law, and in view also of the fact that there is in this emergency or epidemic fund a sufficient sum to provide against any contingency until the end of this fiscal year, I think we should not appropriate any more at this time.

If the bill becomes a law the Department can then submit its estimate to Congress and the estimate can be reviewed and the amount necessary to carry on the service for the next fiscal year can be ascertained with some degree of certainty and carried in the same appropriation bill that now carries the appropriation for the quarantine service. There is absolutely no necessity for making an appropriation at this time, and it is not good legislation for this House to proceed to appropriate funds in this manner, without any investigation whatever. I do not urge this amendment in any spirit of criticism, nor do I complain of the committee that reported this bill because it carries an appropriation in violation of the rules of the House, nor do I offer it because the Committee on Appropriations is the proper committee from which the appropriation should come. It is in the interest of good legislation and in the interest of better administration and greater economy in the administration of this proposed law that I have offered the amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was a member of the Ways and Means Committee when the war-revenue bill was put into force, and if I recollect right, that bill carried some $300,000 to put it into force, and the gentleman voted for that bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; that was a war measure, however. The necessity for the appropriation was immediate; it is not so in this case. I know it has been the practice of this House, and the practice has grown to an enormous extent, as I have shown by the twenty bills which I hold in my hand and which are now on the Union Calendar, reported from committees having legislative jurisdiction, which bills propose some kind of new service, and carry an aggregate appropriation of $9,289,705. These appropriations, like the one under consideration, have been favorably reported without the slightest consideration as to their actual necessity, without any restriction whatever upon the discretion of the Department authorized to expend them, and with no opportunity on the part of this House to revise estimates or scrutinize expenditures. I think that the House ought to, if we are going to consider this matter, consider it intelligently, and appropriate only so much money as is necessary to carry on the service. As there is already available a balance sufficient to more than meet the demands of the service even under this bill, and that balance being available if this bill becomes a law, I hope the amendment will prevail.

[Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania and Mr. WANGER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask unanimous consent for two minutes time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether the money he speaks of being in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Marine-Hospital Service could be made available for immediate use?

Mr. TAWNEY. It can be. I will read the provision in the current law on this subject:

Assigned to duty in preventing, and preventing the spread of the same, and in such emergency—shall be available in the execution of any quarantine laws which may be then in force, the same to be immediately available.

Speaking of this fund—

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the gentleman for his explanation, but it does not quite satisfy me. I live in a community that is not endangered by these terrible fevers, and my sympathy goes out to the people who are striving to protect themselves from the ravages of disease, and I fear very much that if the Secretary of the Treasury should establish under the first section of this bill these stations that the bill authorizes him to establish, he would not have the money before the next meeting of Congress to enable him to defray the ordinary and necessary expenses.

I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that this is not a good way to appropriate money, but it seems to me, sir, that this is urgent. Perhaps before next fall the South may have upon it an awful scourge which might be prevented if the provisions of this bill could be put in force immediately upon its passage, and I would not like to vote against making an appropriation that would surely enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prevent disaster and distress.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I stated in offering the amendment that it was not offered in any spirit of hostility to the measure, but on the contrary I am in favor of it, and will report from the Committee on Appropriations an appropriation to carry it into effect as soon as the bill becomes a law. There are only three months remaining of this fiscal year, and we must yet make appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, including the quarantine service, so there is no necessity of being alarmed. There is no emergency existing at this time which demands that this appropriation be made immediately. That is why I made the motion I did.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota, that perhaps the opportunity will be given in which his committee can report a provision to carry into effect the provisions of this bill. But it may happen that this measure will not become law until the very last days of this session of Congress; and for that reason, if for no other, it would seem to me that if this bill is to become law and any part of our country is to have the benefit of its valuable provision—and I do not charge my friend with any hostility to the bill—I think we ought to make it right in every part at this time. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota. The amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will emasculate the bill. Section 8 reads:

That the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. Speaker, that is not new language. Some months ago, not much over a year or two years ago, there was a bill which passed this House appropriating exactly this amount of money, "or so much thereof as may be necessary," without any previous estimate, for the purpose of protecting Rhode Island and Connecticut cattle from infection by Massachusetts cattle suffering with foot-and-mouth disease. The language is not new; the precedent is not new. We did not hear one word at that time from the gentleman from Minnesota saying that there ought to be previous estimates to determine how many cases of foot-and-mouth disease there were going to be. From the very nature of this sort of case, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to estimate accurately beforehand just what is going to be required to grapple with a yellow-fever epidemic. Already mosquitoes are buzzing and already yellow fever has broken out in Central America. A case in Costa Rica, a case in Panama—and the Panama case afterwards denied; but it is mosquito time down in Dixie, and it is yellow-fever time in South and Central America.

Now, the gentleman says that later on the Appropriations Committee will report the item. I have not the slightest doubt that he will report an appropriation. But we can not afford to wait upon it. "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." We would rather take the appropriation right now. The gentleman says that out of the last appropriation $147,000 or $148,000 or $149,000 was left; I have forgotten the figures. Mr. Speaker, if the yellow fever did not break out, the Marine-Hospital Corps could deal with this matter with the amount of money on hand, and perhaps not need it even. If the yellow fever does break out they can not deal with it with the amount of money left over from the last appropriation plus all this even. Why, last year when yellow fever broke out the citizens of New Orleans, in the way of voluntary contributions, gave nearly $400,000, and then besides it cost the State of Louisiana and the city of New Orleans a great deal. It cost Mississippi and the balance of the country a great deal, not alone in our intrastate quarantine, but for interstate and foreign commerce quarantine work. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that my friend from Minnesota will not insist upon his motion. He is not going to stand here and tell me that New England cattle are worth any more, stand any more sacredly in the regard of the American people than southern human beings, and I hope he will withdraw his amendment, and will not even insist on a vote upon it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman does not want to take the position of giving the Federal Government the power while he does not give the Federal Government the money to execute the power.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me to answer, I will say the appropriation——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say to my friend that the money on hand is not available for the purpose of buying quarantine stations.

Mr. TAWNEY. The amount now on hand is available for any purpose in the event of an emergency such as the gentleman is anticipating, in the event that it exists.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But under the laws existing now, the amount of which the gentleman speaks as having been left is to be spent under existing law, and that law does not make the establishment of quarantine stations by the United States Government mandatory.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to read the paragraph of the current sundry civil bill:

> The President of the United States is hereby authorized, in case of threatened or actual epidemic of cholera, typhus fever, yellow fever, smallpox, bubonic plague, Chinese plague, or black death, to use the unexpended balance of the sums appropriated and reappropriated by the sundry civil appropriation act approved April 28, 1904, and $100,000 in addition thereto, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in aid of State and local boards, or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same, including pay and allowances of all officers and employees of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service assigned to duty in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same, and in such emergency in the execution of any quarantine laws which may be then in force, the same to be immediately available.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That gives no right to purchase and establish quarantine stations.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is left to the discretion of the President, to be expended in any manner that he may see fit in the emergency contemplated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But that discretion has been construed to mean that they will not establish a quarantine station unless it is ceded without price.

Mr. TAWNEY. By the bill the Marine-Hospital Service have the right to expend the money for any purpose deemed necessary, in the judgment of the President, for the suppression of the disease.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whoever told you that was mistaken—not theoretically, but practically.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana rose.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman. Suppose——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recognized, but on the contrary the Chair desires to recognize the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I was not aware of the fact that the gentleman from Louisiana had asked recognition or I would not have run so contrary to the wishes of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana had asked it, and had been promised recognition, and now he has it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I had not heard of it.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I sincerely hope that this amendment will not be insisted upon. It is very necessary, sir, if we are going to pass this act, to arm the Marine-Hospital Service with the sinews of war to carry it out. That matter has been so thoroughly explained by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the leader of the minority, that I will devote the few minutes given to me to explaining why I think section 7 is necessary in this bill.

The pending bill is one of the utmost importance to my State and the entire South, especially the States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico. Its purpose is to keep out of this country by a uniform and efficient national quarantine system the terrible disease that we know as yellow fever. What are its provisions?

First. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Marine-Hospital and Public Health Service, to establish a uniform and efficient quarantine system along our seacoast, and thereby prevent the importation of yellow fever into the country.

Second. It appropriates $500,000 for preventing the importation of yellow fever, and for the further purpose, in cooperation with the State and municipal health authorities, of eradicating it should it be imported, of preventing its spread from State to State, and of destroying its cause wherever same may be found.

Third. It makes it unlawful for anyone to interfere with common carriers in the transportation of freight or passengers between the States, provided same shall not debark without consent of the local authorities.

These in brief are the terms of this bill. It does not prevent the States from continuing to have their own quarantine systems, maritime and otherwise, if they so desire. It does not invade or trample on any of the rights of the States in handling the disease should it break out, but merely proposes to have the health department of the General Government cooperate with and aid the local authorities to eradicate yellow fever and to prevent its spread. While Louisiana might, and doubtless would, turn over its maritime quarantine station to the National Government if this bill is enacted, just as Florida and Georgia have already done, its enactment would not affect her State and municipal boards of health. Their functions would continue unimpaired, and in case of an outbreak of yellow fever the Marine-Hospital Service, under its terms, would cooperate with our local health authorities and would furnish the money to operate on.

Instead of New Orleans being compelled to raise a quarter of a million dollars to fight this scourge, as it was forced to do last year, the greater part of the money to carry on the fight would be furnished by the nation. Instead of small communities, like Lake Providence and Tallulah in my own district, being compelled to spend, at a great sacrifice to them, about $10,000 each, a large part thereof would be furnished by the Government.

Why is this bill necessary? Yellow fever causes a panic; the people lose their reason; business is suspended; communities, even in the same State, rise up in arms against each other; each community becomes a law unto itself; steamboats are not allowed to land and transact business; railroad trains are not allowed to stop for any purpose except to take on or put off the United States mail; they can not carry freight or passengers, and practically all business is stopped. Interstate trains carrying passengers and freight are stopped at State lines by armed men and further progress prohibited. Many people die from the disease, and incalculable financial losses result from it. So many foreign and interstate questions are involved which are entirely beyond the power and control of the States that it is absolutely necessary for the nation to take charge of the situation.

Yellow fever is a foreign foe. It is not indigenous to the soil of the Union. It is imported from foreign countries, along with foreign commerce, and as it is clearly the duty of Congress to regulate and control commerce with foreign nations it should regulate and control the commerce which introduces into our country this terrible pestilence. Yellow fever is not confined to State lines when it starts, but rapidly spreads from one State to another. If unchecked and uncontrolled, it would infect the entire population of the Southern States in one year and cause incalculable loss of life and property.

Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas each have their separate, distinct, and independent systems of maritime quarantine, and business rivalry sometimes influences their regulations. If this disease could be confined to the State which it enters and did not speedily invade other States, thereby destroying lives and entailing heavy financial losses, we might consent for each State to take the consequences of its own mismanagement or misfortune in allowing yellow fever to enter its portals. But under the actual circumstances surrounding it the people of the entire Union are interested in the quarantine at every port, and the only way to insure a uniform and thoroughly effective service is by a national quarantine under one head, with the same regulations at Galveston as at New Orleans, the same at New Orleans as at Gulfport, the same at Gulfport as at Mobile, Pensacola, and Brunswick. Moreover, the nation could have its representatives at every foreign port whence yellow fever comes, and whenever there is any prevalence of the disease in these places the health authorities at every station on our coast could be notified and thoroughly posted. No State would have the same right or power to maintain an effective inspection service abroad as the National Government.

The gist of this bill lies in national control of the seacoast quarantine, and if this is made effective, yellow fever will be kept out of the country, and there will be no occasion to invoke the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, while the yellow-fever epidemic of 1905 was a terrible thing and caused not only great loss of life in the South, but also the loss of many millions of dollars, it demonstrated unmistakably the truth of the theory that yellow fever is conveyed only by the bite of the female Stegomyia fasciata mosquito, and the demonstration of that fact is of incalculable benefit to us. Prior to last year the medical men of our Army Corps had succeeded in stamping out yellow fever in Havana during our possession of that city by destroying this variety of mosquito and taking every precaution against it, but the average layman of the South, and even some of its medical men did not believe in the theory. They were "doubting Thomases." To them yellow fever was, as it had always been in the past, a hidden, mysterious foe, stealing upon them like a thief in the night, destroying their lives so quickly and with such intense agony that they felt for it a holy and great horror. During last year, however, so many articles were published about the mosquito and so many demonstrations made in every community where yellow fever existed that every intelligent man in the country now knows that yellow fever can be conveyed only by the bite of this mosquito, and we know how to fight and guard against it. We will never have the same dread of the fever that existed in the past, especially if this bill becomes a law and the wise, protecting hand of the National Government comes in to help us to guard against it. We earnestly desire and call for the nation's help. We feel that the task is too great for us, and that it is the nation's duty to help us.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I may be pardoned some personal reminiscences of the fever of last year, which demonstrate forcibly the necessity of the clause preventing interference with the passage of interstate trains. My home town, Lake Providence, La., was visited by this plague and suffered greatly. After it had existed there for some weeks and grim despair took possession of every person in the community, the physicians decided that it was best for everyone to leave who could possibly do so, in order to destroy the food supply of the mosquitoes. They said that if there were no fresh victims for the mosquitoes to feed upon the disease would soon die out. Under these circumstances, the Gould railroad, the only railroad entering the town, running north through Arkansas into Missouri, placed every facility at our disposal for the rapid movement of the people, and agreed to take them for one-half fare to any point in the North which was willing to receive them. At this juncture the governor of Arkansas decided that no train should be allowed to pass from Louisiana through that State, and, in order to enforce his rules, a body of men clothed in the State uniform and fully armed was stationed at every railroad entering the State from Louisiana with instructions to prevent the passage of trains.

Of course this effectively prevented the people of Lake Providence from going north in that direction. They were forced to go south and change at Tallulah, which was also pest ridden, to the Queen and Crescent system, going thence east and north through Mississippi, Alabama, etc. A number of large parties left for the North, and I was with the party which left last. Our heroic conductor, Riley Ferrier, in switching our train at Tallulah was bitten by a mosquito and five days later was a corpse. He died at the post of duty, attempting to save the lives of his fellow-men, and was truly a hero. Had we been allowed to pass through Arkansas—not to stop there, but merely to go as fast as the train would carry us from one side of the State to the other, for none of us wished to stop within its borders, merely to pass through to some northern point—poor Riley Ferrier might be living yet. Our train sped rapidly through Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, and Kentucky, and at the hospitable city of Lexington a number of our people were received and kindly treated. Before reaching that city it was ascertained that yellow fever had broken out among the passengers, and seven of them had well-defined cases. You can imagine the state of panic existing then among them. At Lexington the train was boarded by two of the health officers of the city of Cincinnati, who, being informed of the fever among our party, told us that they had no fear; that their city was willing and anxious to receive us and would take the best possible care of our sick.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I can not yield, for I have not the time.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I want to make a point of order against the gentleman talking more than five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes longer.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will you answer a question?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I understand the gentleman to say that by the time he got to Lexington there were twelve cases of yellow fever.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that that justifies the governor of Arkansas in not permitting you to spread yellow fever?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. No, sir; because by that time we would have been beyond the borders of the State and the Stegomyia mosquito, the mosquito that gives the yellow fever, does not live north of the Missouri line. Moreover, the train was carefully screened and there was no opportunity for the mosquito to get in there and bite anyone.

In a short while Cincinnati was reached, and in one of its great hospitals the seven persons on this ill-fated train, sick with yellow fever, were cared for and every one of them nursed back to health. Not only were the seven sick cared for in this hospital, but ten members of their families who remained with them to assist in nursing them. The very best trained nurses and physicians in the city of Cincinnati were in constant attendance. Everything was done which science could suggest and money provide, and though every one of these seventeen people expected to pay in full for the services rendered them, and were able and willing to do so, not one cent would be received by the city authorities. They were all the city's guests. They could not even tip the waiters or pay their laundry bills.

I have told this story often, and I propose to tell it as long as I live, for, in my judgment, the action of the city of Cincinnati was so noble, so kind, and so good on that occasion that it deserves to be known and remembered among all men.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that yellow fever causes such terrible panic and such fearful financial losses as it does, and in spite of the fact that it, far more than any other disease known to us Americans, interferes with and absolutely destroys commerce between the States for months at a time, it actually causes the death of a very small number of human beings compared with other diseases. Though I was born and reared in the State of Louisiana, I was greatly surprised myself in examining the statistics of this subject to ascertain the very small percentage of deaths from yellow fever compared with other diseases. I wish to make some comparisons, and while they show that such diseases as typhoid fever, pneumonia, consumption, and scarlet fever carry off a great many more human beings than ever yellow fever does, that fact does not militate in the slightest degree against the necessity for this legislation, nor does it follow therefrom that similar legislation should be enacted to control these diseases, for none of them interfere in the slightest degree with interstate commerce, and it is under the commerce clause of the Constitution that we find our warrant and authority in enacting this bill.

During the twenty-five years beginning with 1881 and ending with 1905, the total number of deaths from yellow fever in New Orleans—a city of 325,000 people—was only 838. During the same period the deaths from pneumonia were 10,799; Bright's disease, 8,141; heart disease, 12,591; senility, 8,503; smallpox, 2,796.

Thus it appears that very few people, comparatively speaking, died of yellow fever. The largest number of deaths in any of the years in question was in 1905, when out of a total of 3,402 cases of yellow fever there were 452 deaths—a fraction over 13 per cent. During this same year, 1905, there were 1,060 deaths from tuberculosis, 440 from pneumonia, and 516 from Bright's disease—more than twice as many from consumption as yellow fever, about the same number from pneumonia, and more from Bright's disease. And yet no one in New Orleans fears consumption, pneumonia, or Bright's disease. They are ever present, working steadily and surely in this great southern metropolis, as in every other city of the land.

In the whole State of Louisiana in 1905, including New Orleans, there were a total of 9,321 cases of yellow fever and 988 deaths—a fraction over 10.2 per cent of mortality. The disease was widely disseminated, as follows:

I now wish to make some comparisons of yellow fever in New Orleans with other diseases elsewhere. During the year 1902, New York City had an estimated population of 3,632,501 souls. It lost in 1902 from pneumonia 9,377, or 2.58 per 1,000; from tuberculosis 8,883, or 2.45 per 1,000; from typhoid fever 764, or 0.21 per 1,000.

Now it does not appear that pneumonia was especially fatal that year, but it seems to have been about as usual. Let us compare it with yellow fever in New Orleans during the great epidemic of 1905, when there were 452 deaths out of a total population of 325,000, or at the rate of 1.34 per 1,000. Had the mortality in yellow fever been as great even during this epidemic year 1905, as pneumonia was in New York during the average year 1902, with a ratio of 2.58 per 1,000, there would have been 838 deaths from it instead of 452. Moreover I find that in the original city of New York—Manhattan and the Bronx—during the twenty-five years from 1878 to 1902, inclusive, there were 20,095 deaths from scarlet fever, an average annual death rate per 1,000 of 0.548, which is over one-half of 1 per cent. In New Orleans during the twenty-five years from 1881 to 1905, inclusive, there were 838 deaths from yellow fever, an average annual death rate of 0.123—about one-eighth of 1 per cent. Had yellow fever been as fatal during these twenty-five years in New Orleans as scarlet fever was in New York, there would have been 3,791 deaths from it instead of 838.

It thus appears that for a period of twenty-five years scarlet fever was about four and a half times as fatal in New York as yellow fever was in New Orelans, and that pneumonia in the ordinary year, 1902, was nearly twice as fatal in New York as yellow fever was in New Orleans during the epidemic year of 1905. If pneumonia in New York for twenty-five years be compared with yellow fever in New Orleans for the same period, it will be seen that there were, in proportion to population, fully twenty deaths in New York from pneumonia to one death in New Orleans from yellow fever.

In Baltimore, a city of 541,000 people, there were 938 deaths from typhoid fever in the five years from 1900 to 1904 inclusive, and the percentage of deaths to cases was 21.21 per cent. In New Orleans, with 325,000 people, there were 452 deaths from yellow fever in the five years from 1901 to 1905 inclusive, and the percentage of deaths to cases was 13.28. If we take the two diseases for the past twenty-five years the comparison will be much more striking, for during that period Baltimore had 4,528 deaths from typhoid, as against 838 from yellow fever in New Orleans. Moreover, pneumonia is nearly as fatal in Baltimore as in New York. Indeed, it is very fatal in all northern cities. Hence it appears that the percentage of deaths to cases is far larger for typhoid in Baltimore (21.21 per cent) than for yellow fever in New Orleans (13.28) and that in the past twenty-five years there were more than three deaths from typhoid in Baltimore to every death from yellow fever in New Orleans.

In Washington City—the capital of the nation—there were 4,395 deaths from typhoid fever in twenty-five years ending with 1905, an average annually of 176 persons, and at the average rate per 1,000 of 0.708. Now, Washington and New Orleans have practically the same population, and when we compare the 838 deaths from yellow fever in New Orleans—33 a year—with the 4,395 from typhoid fever in Washington—176 a year, over five times as many—it makes a good showing for the latter city.

Similar comparisons with fatal diseases could be made for each of the great cities, but these suffice to show that yellow fever kills very few persons compared with pneumonia, consumption, Bright's disease, scarlet fever, typhoid fever, etc.

A common impression prevails that New Orleans is an unhealthy city. That is a great mistake. In spite of the occasional ravages of yellow fever, it is as healthy as most any of our large cities. Statistics of mortality are usually given for the entire population of a city. Now, New Orleans has a large negro population, and the mortality among negroes is very much greater than among the whites. During the year 1904, the death rate of whites was 17.66 per 1,000, and of negroes, 30.19, or an average for the city of 20.98. About the same percentage of race mortality exists in cities like Baltimore and Washington, which also have a large negro population. For the purpose of comparison with great northern cities like New York, Philadelphia, etc., where practically all the citizens are whites, I think it fair to eliminate the negroes, and on that basis we have the following table, which makes a very favorable showing for New Orleans:

City.	Year.	Deaths per 1,000.
New York	1902	[a] 18.75
Philadelphia	1904	[a] 18.44
Boston	1904	[a] 17.50
St. Louis	1904	[a] 17.14
Cincinnati	1904	[a] 20.34
San Francisco	1901-2	[a] 19.42
Baltimore	1904	[b] 17.02
Washington	1904	[a] 16.08
New Orleans	1904	[a] 17.66

[a] Total population. [b] White population.

The year 1902 is taken for New York and San Francisco, as those were the latest available statistics.

It thus appears that the death rate among the whites in New Orleans during 1904 was actually much less than in Philadelphia and Cincinnati, and much less than the rate for 1902 in New York and San Francisco.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that the people of the South, and especially of Louisiana, are watching our actions here to-day with great solicitude and anxiety. They regard the passage of this bill as essential to their welfare. They love and revere the old doctrine of State rights, but they are as loyal and true to the Union as to their States. Their wisest statesmen tell them that this bill infringes no rights of the States, but exercises power clearly delegated to Congress by the foreign and interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. They believe this, and they are firmly convinced that this legislation will prove of the greatest benefit to the entire nation. They believe, sir, that if this bill becomes a law and the dreaded pestilence of yellow fever should again invade our land, the knowledge that the National Government is in charge, that its officials are in every pest-stricken community, armed with the power and authority of the nation to assist in stamping it out and protecting every other community, regardless of local or selfish interests, would be like the voice of the Master saying to the winds and waves, "Peace, be still."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, if there is any proposition which is beyond question it is that the Federal Government is a ,government not only of limited powers, but a government of enumerated powers. Strict constructionists and latitudinarians are all agreed here. It is hornbook law. When they met in Philadelphia and adopted the Constitution which brought into being the more perfect Union, the States met as independent States clothed with every attribute of sovereignty. They then formed the Federal Union, delegating to it such powers as their judgment commended, but "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, were reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." Such is the language of that great instrument. In the first article of the Constitution Congress was given power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." It is an interesting fact that the necessity for this section more than all else was the impelling cause which brought the States together, first at Annapolis, and finally at Philadelphia, and led them eventually into "the more perfect Union." It was never dreamed by the authors of that section that they were then surrendering the police powers of the States to the Federal Government, and had any such theory stalked unbidden into their deliberations the convention would have ended in a day.

In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce—

It was never intended to cut the States off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation in a great variety of ways may affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution.

In the early days of our political history John Marshall was most harshly criticised by the strict constructionists and denounced as a latitudinarian whose theories of constitutional construction were leading us headlong into a centralized government. When we hold up the Constitution to-day and insist upon the limitations to Federal power which Marshall himself pointed out, we are smiled at, if indeed we are not laughed at, as sticklers and doctrinaires. As for myself, I am not a strict constructionist, but I do believe there are some limitations upon the Federal authority. I believe John Marshall was the greatest jurist who ever graced the Supreme bench, and he was a Federalist. In the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden, which we have heard quoted so frequently this session, he said:

Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State and those which respect turnpikes, roads, etc., form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government. No direct general power over these subjects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

And again, in the same opinion, he says:

The acts of Congress, passed in 1796 and 1799 (1 U. S. Stat., 474, 619), empowering and directing the officers of the General Government to conform to and assist in the execution of the quarantine and health laws of a State, proceed, it is said, upon the idea that these laws are constitutional. It is undoubtedly true that they do proceed upon that idea; and the constitutionality of such laws has never, so far as we are informed, been denied. But they do not imply an acknowledgement that a State may rightfully regulate commerce with foreign nations or among the States, for they do not imply that such laws are an exercise of that power, or enacted with a view to it. On the contrary, they are treated as quarantine and health laws, are so denominated in the acts of Congress, and are considered as flowing from the acknowledged power of a State to provide for the health of its citizens. But as it was apparent that some of the provisions made for this purpose and in virtue of this power might interfere with and be affected by the laws of the United States made for the regulation of commerce, Congress, in that spirit of harmony and conciliation which ought always to characterize the conduct of governments standing in the relation which that of the Union and those of the States bear to each other, has directed its officers to aid in the execution of these laws.

Alas for that "spirit of harmony and conciliation" if section 7 of this bill becomes the law. I could read innumerable decisions from our courts holding that quarantine laws are a part of the police powers of a State "which unquestionably remain and ought to remain with the State." The Miln case (in 11 Peters), Gilmans case (3 Wallace), the Slaughter House cases, and a great many others, all reaffirming the doctrine announced in Gibbons v. Ogden, could be quoted. Some people think, and I sometimes incline to the opinion that most people think, that when General Lee surrendered at Appomattox the Constitution of the United States, so far as the rights of the States are concerned, passed into innocuous desuetude. When I listened to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to-day and heard the applause with which his sentences were punctuated, I concluded that that opinion had found lodgment even in this House. Let me read, Mr. Speaker, from a most masterful address on this subject, delivered at Mobile several years ago by E. H. Farrar, esq., of the New Orleans bar. I commend it to every Member of this House:

In Gilman v. Philadelphia, supra, a case decided in December, 1865, almost before the Virginia valleys had ceased to reecho the thunder of battle in a strife, the result of which some people think wiped out and destroyed the rights of the several States and their people and altered their position under the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Justice Swayne for the court said:

"The National Government possesses no powers but such as have been delegated to it. The States have all but such as they have surrendered."

I will read only one more case, Mr. Speaker, on this point, and will then discuss the provisions of the bill and endeavor to demonstrate the vice of the amendment which the committee has ingrafted upon the bill as originally introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS, and which now appears as section 7. I am glad to note that the section 7 which appeared in the bill as reported has been stricken out and a new section offered in its stead. The first one was so vicious that even the committee have abandoned it, and I still hope that even at this late hour they may recognize how utterly wrong in principle, as it will be in practice, is the substitute which they now offer. I read, Mr. Speaker, from the opinion of Justice MacLean in the License cases, reported in 5 Howard:

The license acts of Massachusetts do not purport to be a regulation of commerce. They are police laws. Enactments similar in principle are common to all the States. * * * The acknowledged police power of a State extends often to the destruction of property. A nuisance may be abated. Everything prejudicial to the health or morals of a city may be removed. Merchandise from a port where a contagious disease prevails, being liable to communicate the disease, may be excluded; and in extreme cases it may be thrown into the sea. This comes in direct conflict with the regulation of commerce; and yet no one doubts the local power. It is a power essential to self-preservation and exists necessarily in every organized community. It is indeed the law of nature, and is possessed by man in his individual capacity. He may resist that which does him harm, whether he be assailed by an assassin or approached by poison. And it is the settled construction of every regulation of commerce that, under the sanction of its general laws, no person can introduce into a community malignant diseases, or anything which contaminates its morals or endangers its safety. And this is an acknowledged principle applicable to all general regulations. Individuals in the enjoyment of their own rights must be careful not to injure the rights of others.

From the explosive nature of gunpowder a city may exclude it. Now, this is an article of commerce, and is not known to carry infectious disease; yet to guard against a contingent injury, a city may prohibit its introduction. These exceptions are always implied in commercial regulations, where the General Government is admitted to have exclusive power.

They are not regulations of commerce, but acts of self-preservation. And although they affect commerce to some extent, yet such effect is the result of the exercise of an undoubted power in the State.

Just one more sentence from the same case. I read now from the opinion of Justice Grier, speaking of the police powers:

As subjects of legislation they are from their very nature of primary importance; they lie at the foundation of social existence; they are for the protection of life and liberty, and necessarily compel all laws on subjects of secondary importance which relate only to property, convenience, or luxury to recede when they come in conflict or collision. Salus populi suprema lex.

Such was the universal rule, Mr. Speaker, announced by all the judges in all the decisions for nearly a hundred years of our national life, but in recent years there have been one or two suggestions thrown out by some Supreme judges which indicate a possible departure from this ancient and honored doctrine.

If I were certain that the Supreme Court would follow the opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, reproduced, reaffirmed, and commended in so many opinions delivered by that court, I would not have so many misgivings as to this bill, because I am quite sure it would be declared unconstitutional. But it is because I am afraid that that court is going to adopt the opinion of Judge Miller in the Morgan Steamship case that I am so much opposed to it as it is now framed. I was in favor of the Mallory bill. I was in favor of the bill introduced by my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS], but I can not give my support to the bill which the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has reported and which we are asked to pass to-day.

In dealing with interstate trains the State health authorities have no unlimited power. They can make no regulations which affect interstate commerce as to passengers or freight which are not reasonable. The courts have held this uniformly. They have a right under the exercise of the police power to make reasonable regulations, and, in my opinion, no correct construction of the Federal Constitution can take that right from them. Although the courts have held that the police power remains with the States and that it is exclusive with the States, in the light of Judge Miller's opinion, and especially since that opinion has been quoted approvingly by several judges in decisions since then, I am not at all certain that they will hold that section 7 of this bill is unconstitutional. For fifty years the Supreme Court, following the common law, held that the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty extended only to such waters as were affected by the ebb and flow of the tide. For the past fifty years they have as consistently held that the ebb and flow of the tide has nothing to do with the question of jurisdiction. In a very interesting, instructive, and I was about to say masterful, speech on this floor a few days ago my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] cited a long array of decisions from the earliest days of the Republic, in which John Marshall and Story and a number of other eminent judges had held for sixty-five years that a corporation was not a citizen of a State in which it was incorporated in the sense that suits to which it was a party might be transferred to the Federal courts solely on the ground that the other party to the suit was a citizen of another State. Yet for more than sixty years, and ever since the decision of Chief Justice Taney in the case of Railroad Company v. Letson, that court has uniformly held the contrary doctrine. In nearly every case involving a great constitutional question which comes before the court to-day they are divided five to four. While I have great respect for stare decisis, I am not willing to stake the life of the State on my conviction that our Supreme Court will hold to that most salutary doctrine.

Those who advocate section 7 proceed upon the theory of the infallibility of Federal officials. They seem to believe that there is some divinity which doth hedge about the officers of the Marine-Hospital Service, which exempts them from that liability to err common to all other flesh. If only he will properly certify that the train is clean, that its passengers and freight are free from yellow fever, every person who interferes with or obstructs such cars or any passenger thereon shall be punished in the Federal courts by fine and imprisonment. If the certificate says the horse is 17 feet high, he who questions it does so at his peril. If a passenger should board a train at New Orleans for Memphis, armed with a health certificate from the Federal officer, and should develop yellow fever along the route, he would nevertheless be permitted to pass through the State of Mississippi, beyond the power of molestation by any health authorities of the State, and the citizens of the State would have to depend absolutely and wholly upon the Secretary of the Treasury to make proper regulations for their protection from the contagion of his disease.

The thought of the State surrendering the right to enforce reasonable precautionary regulations against such an infected passenger, while he passed through the length of the State, is to me monstrous. If the train be filled with yellow-fever patients with every window open, with never a screen about it, that train can pass through the State making necessary stops at every water tank, at every coal tipple, be sidetracked in every town in order that some other train may pass down the main line, with nothing to prevent the Stegomyia entering the train and becoming infected and flying thence on her mission of death. And any officer, from the governor of the State down, who would attempt to interfere with the train in any way, who would insist upon having the train properly screened, or who would attempt to enforce any reasonable regulations prescribed by the State health officers, would be subject to arrest and imprisonment for a Federal offense. It is urged by those who favor the bill that this would never happen because the Secretary of the Treasury would provide the necessary "regulations, restrictions, and safeguards." Why should any community be left to the mercy of the Secretary of the Treasury or any other Federal officer? Why arm him with such plenary power? Why confide so completely in the infallibility of his judgment? It was the Secretary of the Treasury who, in the administration of the Dingley tariff law, decided that frog legs were dressed poultry. We authorized him to make such rules and regulations for the government of his office as to him seemed best calculated to promote the public interest, and he thereupon "promulgated a regulation" which forbids every internal-revenue collector in the service to give evidence in State courts against illicit whisky sellers. What more unjust and indefensible invasion of the police power of the State can be imagined? Why intrust to an officer who shows such disregard for the moral well-being, the civic health of a community as to use the tremendous power of his great office to shield the blind tiger? Why, I repeat, intrust to him the exclusive right to make "regulations, restrictions, and safeguards" to protect the physical health of our people?

What earthly objection can there be to permitting the local health authorities to prescribe reasonable regulations to protect the people in the several communities through which these interstate trains must pass from the deadly infection which the train bears? It is insisted that this is an extreme view and one altogether unlikely to happen. This is no answer at all. Under the provisions of section 7 it may happen. It is not impossible to happen, and I shall never vote for any bill which surrenders this, in my opinion, the most necessary power that any State ever had. You talk of sovereign States! You had as well talk of the sovereign county of Washington as the sovereign State of Mississippi, when the police power, the power to protect the health of the people from pestilence and disease, is surrendered to the Secretary of the Treasury. The whole theory of this section is predicated on the idea that interstate passengers are entitled to rights paramount and superior to all other persons. In my opinion those who remain at home, and who in times of epidemic nurse the sick and bury the dead, are equally entitled to consideration. I do not believe the State has any power to regulate interstate commerce or to interfere with interstate trains under the exercise of the police power except by regulations which are reasonable, and if any other interference has ever been attempted or practiced by any State its action was in contravention of the Constitution, and was therefore unlawful. What individuals have done or may do I will not undertake to say. As long as men organize in mobs to override the law of the land and execute vengence on individuals, I have no doubt that interstate trains will be interfered with and that interstate passengers will be inconvenienced in times of yellow-fever panic and excitement. The illustration of the unwarranted interference by State officers with interstate trains most frequently given in the cloakroom and referred to here on the floor of the House in this debate and paraded almost constantly in that part of the press most actively supporting this bill is the case referred to by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], where a train load of refugees from Lake Providence, La., were stopped at the border of Arkansas and denied permission to cross the State. Strange to relate, this instance is held up to this House and to the country as furnishing alone sufficient reason and ample justification for the adoption of section 7 of this bill, and yet we are assured by its advocates that section 7 relates only to interstate trains which, to quote the bill, "may have been discharged and properly certified in accordance with the regulations of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service."

Will anybody venture the opinion that this particular train was or could have been so certified? If not, under the same circumstances, they could be met again at the border line of the State of Arkansas, exactly as they were before, and the train turned back exactly as it was turned back before, even were section 7 the law. Will any advocate of this bill hazard the opinion that a train similarly circumstanced will be certified hereafter if this section is adopted? If not, it would not be protected by the provisions of section 7, because that applies only to such trains as "may be properly certified," etc. If, on the contrary, they believe it would have been so certified, then their faith in the infallibility of these officers must suffer a rude shock, because my good friend Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana, who was on that train, tells you that before they reached Cincinnati seven cases of yellow fever developed among the passengers.

Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to penalizing any unlawful obstruction or interference with interstate trains. I believe trains have a right to cross the State of Mississippi, but as long as they are within the borders of that State they must be subject to such reasonable regulations as the health authorities of Mississippi may prescribe. They have a right, by virtue of their interstate character, to pass through the State, but they have no right to scatter the germs of disease and death among the citizens of the State in the course of their transit. In the language of Judge MacLean in the Passenger cases:

> In giving the commercial power to Congress the States did not part with that power of self-preservation which must be inherent in every organized community. They may guard against the introduction of anything which may corrupt the morals or endanger the health or lives of their citizens.

In order to preserve the peace and provide for the comfort of the passengers the State may prescribe any and all reasonable regulations for the government, the conduct, and the management of the trains while in its borders. It may require separate coaches for the two races, in the interest of peace and for the comfort of the passengers. This is purely a matter of police, exclusively within the power of the State. It may require screens in times of yellow-fever epidemic to prevent the entrance into, or the escape from, the trains of the deadly Stegomyia. It may enforce reasonable regulations as to fumigation of freight cars and steamboats, and I shall never vote for any measure which denies or attempts to take from the States this power. The advocates of the bill on this side of this Chamber insist that this right is not taken from the State by this section and assert that no decision of the Supreme Court even squints at the possibility of such power being vested in the Federal Government. In the Morgan Steamship case Judge Miller says:

> But it may be conceded that whenever Congress shall undertake to provide for the commercial cities of the United States a general system of quarantine, or shall confide the details of such a system to a national board of health, or to local boards, as may be found expedient, all State laws on the subject will be abrogated, at least so far as the two are inconsistent.

And this opinion has been quoted with approval in several cases since that time. I know this is regarded as dicta by some of the ablest lawyers in this House, but other able lawyers here are equally as certain that it is not. Mr. E. H. Farrar, of the New Orleans bar, in the address before referred to at the quarantine convention at Mobile in 1898, and which has been very extensively quoted in the debate on this bill, is universally conceded to be one of the strongest and ablest lawyers in the country, and no man will lightly consider his opinion. Referring to this opinion of Judge Miller's, he says:

> In my humble opinion, unless the Supreme Bench of the United States shall be packed for the purpose, or unless some grizzly horror shall stalk through this land and make men forget the principles upon which this Government was founded, and abandoning the sacred right of local self-government and the inherent right of self-protection, huddle, like curs, under the protecting wing of a centralized power, no practical application of Judge Miller's new-fangled doctrine will ever be made, and when fairly presented and discussed and its clear repugnance to an immemorial interpretation of the Constitution demonstrated it never will be recognized as making part of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

I hope he is correct in this view, but to my mind section 7 of this bill is an attempt to make "practical application of Judge Miller's new-fangled doctrine."

If I am permitted to do so under the rule which has been reported and adopted, I shall offer an amendment to this section which will make it certain that it is not the intention of the advocates of this bill, to adopt Judge Miller's expression, that "all State laws on the subject will be abrogated." That amendment, Mr. Speaker, is in these words and is offered in the hope that it may be written in this law, and so save to the State the right of self-preservation:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as forbidding State or municipal authorities to enforce against such common carrier any reasonable regulation, prescribed by the health authorities of the State in pursuance of the police power reserved to the States, for the prevention of the spread of yellow fever.

If it is adopted, I shall vote for the bill, because I am in favor of a national maritime quarantine and I am opposed to senseless, reckless, and lawless interference with interstate trains; but I am not willing, in order to secure this, to surrender to the Federal Government the most necessary of all the powers which appertain to local self-government—the power to protect our homes and our families from pestilence, disease, and death. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi that he errs when he makes a comparison between this appropriation and the appropriation for the suppression of the foot-and-mouth disease of cattle in New England. I submit in all fairness, Mr. Speaker, that there is no parallel between this bill and the appropriation to which the gentleman from Mississippi refers. We are not to-day experiencing any yellow-fever epidemic——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Doesn't the gentleman think that this is much the stronger?

Mr. TAWNEY (continuing). Or anything of the kind. The only epidemic that we seem to be suffering from is the epidemic of hysteria in this Chamber. [Laughter.] I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill becomes a law, the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect will then be made, and no one desires or would dare attempt to stop it. In that event, however, the appropriation will be made with some intelligent information as to what amount is necessary for the service authorized. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have informed me that they did not believe that $500,000 would be sufficient, while other gentlemen feel that $500,000 is more than necessary under any circumstances. We are therefore appropriating money for this service without anything but simply a guess to guide us. Those charged with the responsibility of executing the law give us no estimate of what amount will be necessary. Without such estimate, how can we act intelligently in the premises?

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. WANGER. The Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service gave it as his judgment that the cost of acquiring the different stations would be between $300,000 and $400,000. That was entirely exclusive of any cost of administration.

Mr. TAWNEY. If that is the fact, the time for considering the question of the amount required for this new service is in connection with the appropriations for the entire Federal quarantine service for the next fiscal year. The Surgeon-General seems to be satisfied that the funds now on hand will carry him through the present fiscal year without this additional appropriation of $500,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. TAWNEY. I see no reason why we should become panicky in appropriating $500,000 when we don't know whether it is going to be used or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question. I have been trying for a half hour, but the Speaker didn't seem to want me to do so. [Laughter.] Suppose we appropriate $500,000 and you afterwards find it is too much, can not the committee in subsequent appropriation bills limit the amount to the necessary amount?

Mr. TAWNEY. I presume that could be done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then why make the motion here now and throw the bill and the House into confusion?

Mr. TAWNEY. In the meantime you have a lump sum available at the will of the Department without any limitations on it whatever.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If you can restrict it hereafter, I see no need of the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 55, noes 116.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to section 7, to have it read, and have it considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey will be read and considered as pending. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Service," in line 14, page 3, insert: "Provided, That if the Secretary of the Navy shall be called upon, in pursuance of provisions of this act, to turn over to the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purposes of a quarantine station, the lands or plant on the island of Dry Tortugas, now used by the Navy as a coaling station, or any portion thereof, the transfer shall be made upon such conditions and after such reasonable allowance of time for the economical removal of the coal, coaling and distilling plants, and the equipment and appurtenances of the coaling station, as may be agreed upon between the Secretaries of the Treasury and of the Navy; and for the purpose of reimbursing the Navy Department for the expense of so removing such portions of the plant as shall not be turned over to the Treasury Department and for replacing elsewhere so much thereof as may be abandoned, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be agreed upon by the said two Secretaries as necessary and sufficient for such purposes, which sum shall hereafter be appropriated to be expended for the purposes aforesaid by the Navy Department as the Secretary of the Navy shall direct."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from New Jersey will give us some explanation of the necessity for this amendment.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, it will not take me more than a minute or two. Congress has from time to time appropriated money for the naval establishment which has been expended on the islands called "Dry Tortugas."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under a fair construction of the rule, feels that it is his duty to offer an opportunity to two gentlemen to offer amendments, one the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BURLESON, and the other the gentleman from Texas, Mr. HENRY.

Mr. BURLESON. I have no desire to discuss my amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for just one minute.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, and ask that it be read and considered as pending under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after section 7 the following: "And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as a prohibition against any State to establish reasonable inspection and quarantine regulations for the protection of its people, or to prevent the lawful health authorities of any such State, acting in pursuance of such regulations, to prohibit the transportation into or through said State of any interstate car or train of cars or vessel containing articles of commerce or passengers."

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment on the table that I desire to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, before the amendment is reported I will state that it is the bill that passed the Senate on yesterday by unanimous vote, and my amendment merely strikes out all after the enacting clause in the pending bill and after the word "that" and to insert the Senate bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I insist that under the rules of the House the amendment shall be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I ask the gentleman from Iowa not to do that. It will only result in shutting off my amendment if he does it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to have it read.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the reading of his amendment be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit me, there is a clerical error in the bill——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call for the reading of my amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. The clerical error can be corrected by unanimous consent, I will state to the gentleman from Mississippi. I insist that the amendment shall be read.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call for the reading of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the proposed substitute after the first word "That," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "as soon as practicable after the approval of this act the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine Hospital Service of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall select and designate suitable places for quarantine grounds and anchorages for vessels, at such points on or near the coast lines of the United States as, in his judgment, are best suited for quarantine grounds and anchorages and necessary to prevent the introduction of yellow fever into the United States. That in cases in which the title to the land and water so selected and designated is in the United States it shall be the duty of the department, bureau, or official of the United States having custody or possession of such land and water, or any part thereof, not used by the Government for other purposes designated by law, on demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, to deliver the same into his custody and possession for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, evidencing such delivery by a suitable instrument in writing to be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury. That in cases in which the title to such land and water, or any part thereof, is in any other owner than the United States it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to secure the title and possession of the same to the United States for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, by purchase at a reasonable price, if possible; but if in his judgment the price demanded for such property be excessive, he is hereby authorized to apply to the Attorney-General of the United States to cause to be instituted, in the proper tribunal, condemnation proceedings in the name of the United States for the purpose of acquiring for the United States the title and possession of such land and water, and said Attorney-General shall, as soon as possible after such application by the Secretary of the Treasury, cause such proceedings to be instituted and conducted to a conclusion, and the custody and possession of such land and water, when duly acquired in accordance with the award made in such condemnation proceedings, shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

"SEC. 2. That on acquiring possession of any land and water selected and designated by him as quarantine ground and anchorage it shall be the duty of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cause to be published at least once a week for four consecutive weeks, in a newspaper published in the port nearest such proposed quarantine ground and anchorage, a notice of such selection and designation, with a description of the boundaries of such quarantine ground and anchorage, and shall forthwith establish within such boundaries a quarantine ground and anchorage, with such appliances and facilities as he may deem necessary to prevent the introduction of yellow fever into the United States, and upon plans and estimates of cost to be first approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service of the United States, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as soon as practicable after the approval of this act, to establish on one of the islands of the group known as the 'Dry Tortugas,' at the western end of the Florida Reef, a quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, whereto infected vessels having on board any person with yellow fever and bound for any port of the United States may be sent for the purpose of being disinfected, having their cargoes disinfected and discharged if necessary, and their sick treated in hospital until all danger of infection or contagion from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, or crews has been removed. And it shall be the duty of the Department, bureau, or official having the custody or possession of said Tortugas Islands, on demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, to deliver the possession of said islands to the Department of the Treasury, for the use of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service as provided in this act. And if it shall be necessary, in the judgment of said Surgeon-General, for the protection of any other port or ports on the coast of the United States that additional quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge shall be established, he shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, designate such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge at such points as will afford safe anchorages for vessels detained thereat and as will be sufficiently distant from ports or subports of entry of the United States to render danger of infection impossible. That on acquiring possession of said Dry Tortugas or any other locality, in accordance with the provisions of this act, for the purpose of establishing thereat a quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, cause to be published in four such newspapers as he may think proper, once a week for three months, a notice of the selection and designation of such places for quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge, together with such rules and regulations, in conformity with the requirements of this act, as with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury he shall adopt and promulgate, requiring vessels with yellow fever among their passengers or crews to go to such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge, to be dealt with there before visiting any port of the United States. He shall establish at such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge all necessary instrumentalities for disinfecting vessels and their cargoes, shall erect the necessary hospital buildings, and install the necessary furniture and fittings for receiving and treating the sick among the passengers and crews of vessels going to such quarantine stations and anchorages of refuge, and provide for the separation of these among their passengers and crews who are suffering from yellow fever from those who are in good health, and shall further provide for doing all things necessary to eradicate such disease from such vessels, their cargoes, passengers, and crews.

"SEC. 5. That any vessel, or any officer of any vessel, or other person other than State health or quarantine officers, entering within the limits of any quarantine grounds and anchorages, or any quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, or departing therefrom, in disregard of the quarantine rules and regulations, or without the permission of the officer in charge of such quarantine ground and anchorage, or of such quarantine station and anchorage of refuge, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to arrest, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $300 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. That any master or owner of any vessel violating any provision of this act, or any provision of an act entitled 'An act granting additional powers and imposing additional duties on the Marine-Hospital Service, approved February 15, 1893,' or violating any rule or regulation made in accordance with this act, or said act of February 15, 1893, relating to the inspection of vessels, or to the prevention of the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States, or any master, owner, or agent of any vessel making a false statement relative to the sanitary condition of such vessel or its contents, or as to the health of any passenger or person thereon, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 6. That in every port or ports where quarantine stations and plants are already established by State or local authorities it shall be the duty of the said Surgeon-General, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, before selecting and designating a quarantine station and grounds and anchorage for vessels, to examine such established stations and plants, with a view of obtaining a transfer of the site and plants to the United States, and whenever the proper authorities shall be ready to transfer the same or surrender the use thereof to the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to obtain title thereto or possession and use thereof, and to pay a reasonable compensation therefor, if, in his opinion, such purchase or use will be necessary to the United States for quarantine purposes.

"SEC. 7. That from and after the approval of this act the salary of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service shall be $7,000 per annum, payable monthly. That the sum of $500,000, in addition to any sum now available for the purpose, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid on the requisition of the Surgeon-General of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, as well as for the purpose generally of preventing the importation of yellow fever into the United States, and for the further purposes, in cooperation with the State health authorities, of eradicating it should it be imported, of preventing its spread from one State into another State, and of destroying its cause."

The SPEAKER (during the reading). The hour of 5 o'clock has arrived, and under the order the previous question operates upon the substitute and all pending amendments. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to section 7 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment to section 7 of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas now pending or only that portion which has been read?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the substitute is pending.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman to offer that after the enacting clause of the bill as a substitute. Suppose that amendment should be adopted by the House?

The SPEAKER. It is to strike out all after the word "that," an amendment to the substitute. The substitute is amendable in the first degree.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that, but suppose the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas should be adopted by the House. That would not give it the status of the Senate bill, would it?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. PAYNE. Then I do not see any use in the House adopting it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment, which will be to perfect the text, and will be in order before a vote is taken upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

The Clerk began the reading of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment has already been reported. Is there unanimous consent to dispense with rereporting it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is that, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair it is not in order to report it again except by unanimous consent. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question next is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question next is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], and the Clerk will conclude the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent for one-half a minute to make a statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I shall make no objection to that, provided the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] shall have also one-half a minute to reply.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I shall not object.

Mr. HEPBURN. I object; I do not want the gentleman from Texas to have the half minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry——

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of taking the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Forty-three gentlemen have arisen.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Before the "one mores" answered, who did not state how they would vote, the yeas were 43 and the nays were 188; and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call for tellers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the call for tellers in order?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The question was taken; and tellers were refused.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recognized for that purpose, and it is not in order at this time anyway.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. When will it be in order?

The SPEAKER. After the third reading of the bill. The question is on the substitute as amended.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BARTLETT. To know what has become of the amendment I offered.

The SPEAKER. It has been voted down. The question is on agreeing to the substitute as amended.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now move——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I now move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to recommit the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And upon that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to say I thought the Speaker indicated I would be recognized a little later, or I would have been on my feet quicker.

The SPEAKER. No; it is not in the power of the Chair to recognize the gentleman after the gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Oh, but the gentleman from Mississippi demanded the previous question, and that will have to be disposed of first.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I did not catch it from the gentleman on the floor. I heard the Speaker say it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was your fault.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on recommitting the bill.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 202, nays 26, answered "present" 5, not voting 149, as follows:

He also presented a petition of the Westchester Woman's Club, of Mount Vernon, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MARTIN presented petitions of Fries Council, No. 151, of Fries; Cappahosic Council, No. 84, of Cappahosic; Liberty Council, No. 13, of Swansboro; McKinley Council, No. 47, of Gilmerton; Bloxom Council, No. 119, of Bloxom; Dumfries Council, No. 37, of Dumfries; New Hope Council, No. 15, of New Hope; Gilt Edge Council, No. 42, of Mount Sidney; Tidewater Council, No. 30, of Berkley; Mason Council, No. 152, of Portsmouth; Bertha Council, No. 156, of Foster Falls, and of Cyclopean Towers Council, No. 87, of Mount Solon, all of the Junior Order United American Mechanics, in the State of Virginia, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. FRYE presented a memorial of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to abolish compulsory pilotage in certain ports; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a petition of the commercial bodies of Charleston, S. C., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for an increase of the United States Coast Artillery forces by an addition of 4,970 men; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GEARIN (for Mr. CARMACK), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 12182) granting a pension to Sallie W. Mason; and

A bill (H. R. 1895) granting a pension to H. Edward Goetz.

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2993) to ratify an agreement with the Yankton Sioux Indians of South Dakota, and making appropriation to carry the same into effect, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BURNHAM, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5539) for the relief of the State of Rhode Island, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 190) for the relief of L. K. Scott, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PILES, from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 5513) to provide for the disposition of certain property in the Territory of Hawaii; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2996) to reimburse Capt. Sydney Layland for sums paid by him while master of the U. S. transport Mobile in July and August, 1898, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4842) to reimburse Capt. Sydney Layland for sums paid by him while master of the U. S. transport Mobile in July and August, 1898, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment proposing a full settlement of the claims of Germany, Denmark, and France against the United States for losses incurred in connection with the disturbances in Samoa in 1899, intended to be proposed to the general deficiency appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT YANKTON, S. DAK.

Mr. SCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5059) to increase the limit of cost of the post-office at Yankton, S. Dak., to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon.

Mr. GAMBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from West Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office and weather bureau at Yankton, S. Dak., from $80,000 to $81,500, the increase to be employed for the placing of exterior lamp standards, additional lock boxes, together with sundry other minor items.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 5514) to amend section 4472 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the carrying of dangerous articles on passenger steamers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MONEY introduced a bill (S. 5531) for the relief of Francisco Krebs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the improvement of the national boulevard at Fredericksburg, Va., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the construction of a main sewer from Wisconsin avenue, in Tennallytown, to Rock Creek, in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TIMBER ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. FULTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5327) to provide for the disposal of timber on public lands chiefly valuable for timber, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. HEYBURN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with information in detail as to the amount of money that has been collected under the provisions of section 5 of the act entitled "An act providing for the transfer of forest reserves from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture," approved February 1, 1905, from the sale of timber, from grazing privileges, rights of way, and from canals, railroads, telephone lines, and so forth, and for permits to conduct hotels, stores, and other lines of business upon forest reserves during the last fiscal year; and an approximate estimate of the amount that will probably be collected during the present fiscal year; also for what purposes the money already collected is being expended.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution will lie over.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning I shall call up the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over until to-morrow, under objection.

THE SENATE.

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have printed as a document a list of books, articles, etc., treating of the United States Senate, compiled under the direction of A. P. C. Griffin, chief of the division of bibliography, Library of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FLATHEAD INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8461) to amend chapter 1495, Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of the surplus lands under allotment," as provided by section 9 of chapter 1479, Revised Statutes of the United States, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. CLARK of Montana, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. GAMBLE were appointed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 14316. An act to further protect the public health and make more effective the national quarantine was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 17359) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 2, line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert "Said delegates shall be appointed so that, as far as practicable, the different sections of the country shall be represented;" so as to make the clause read:

To meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates of the United States to the Third International Conference of American States to be held at the city of Rio de Janeiro, beginning on the 21st day of July, 1906, and of their salaried clerical assistants, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State, and to continue available during the fiscal year 1907, $60,000. Said delegates shall be appointed so that, as far as practicable, the different sections of the country shall be represented.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 8, to insert:

To enable the Government to participate in the Second International Peace Conference to be convened at The Hague, the Netherlands, and for the payment of the compensation and expenses of a commission thereto on the part of the United States, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, and to be available until used.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 15, to insert:

To enable the Government to participate in the International Conference for the Revision of the Geneva Convention of August 22, 1864, which is to convene at Geneva, Switzerland, on June 11, 1906, and for the payment of the compensation and expenses of delegates thereto on the part of the United States, of whom one shall be an officer of the Army and one of the Navy, $15,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 3, to insert:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

For transportation of silver coin, including fractional silver coin, by registered mail or otherwise, $15,000; and in expending this sum the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to transport from the Treasury or subtreasuries, free of charge, silver coin, when requested to do so: Provided, That an equal amount in coin or currency shall have been deposited in the Treasury or such subtreasuries by the applicant or applicants. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress the cost arising under this appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Interstate Commerce Commission," on page 3, line 13, after the word "to," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "properly carry out the objects" and insert "give effect to the provisions;" so as to read:

To enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to give effect to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce and all acts and amendments supplementary thereto, including the joint resolution "instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies in coal and oil, and report on the same from time to time," approved March 7, 1906, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "District of Columbia," on page 4, after line 18, to insert:

For contingent expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, including the same objects specified under this title of appropriation in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1906, $279.09.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 23, to insert:

For contingent expenses, horseshoeing, furniture, fixtures, oil, medical and stable supplies, harness, blacksmithing, gas and electric lighting, flags and halyards, and other necessary items, for the fire department, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 13, before the word "shall," to strike out "which" and insert "the foregoing amounts to meet deficiencies in the appropriations on account of the District of Columbia;" so as to make the clause read:

For the collection and disposal of garbage and dead animals, miscellaneous refuse and ashes from private residences in the city of Washington and the more densely populated suburbs; for collection and disposal of night soil in the District of Columbia, and for the payment of necessary inspection, livery of horses, and incidental expenses, $46,646.42. One-half of the foregoing amounts to meet deficiencies in the appropriations on account of the District of Columbia shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 16, to insert:

NAVY DEPARTMENT.

For the reclamation of that portion of the naval station at Honolulu, Hawaii, known as the Reef, from material now being dredged from the harbor at Honolulu, and for the necessary dikes or retaining walls, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, such portion thereof as may be agreed upon between the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy as necessary for fortification purposes to be transferred to the War Department, $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 2, to insert:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

For the completion of the resurveys in San Diego County, Cal., authorized by act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, including the surveying out by metes and bounds of all valid claims of record up to March 31, 1906, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following committee amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, after line 15, insert:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

For transportation of the Army and its supplies on account of the fiscal year 1903, including all objects mentioned under this head in the Army apropriation act for the fiscal year 1903, $25,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I wish to address the Senate, but I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Maine. He probably has something to say on the bill.

Mr. HALE. It does not interrupt me. Of course, if the Senator has any proposition to make or any remarks to submit it can be done now.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to line 9, on the first page of the bill, and to the provisions thereafter made for the Third International Conference of American States to be held at the city of Rio de Janeiro. I will read that part of the bill and the amendment which I had proposed, and which has been adopted on the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations:

To meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates of the United States to the Third International Conference of American States to be held at the city of Rio de Janeiro, beginning on the 21st day of July, 1906, and of their salaried clerical assistants, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State, and to continue available during the fiscal year 1907, $60,000.

To that clause of the bill or act the committee, on my motion, recommended the adoption of the amendment which is in the following words:

Said delegates shall be appointed so that, as far as practicable, the different sections of the country shall be represented.

As to the form of this appropriation, Mr. President, it occurs to me that we are following the fashion in making it which has become too common—that of being indefinite and vague in our appropriations. I am not going to oppose the proposition in view; indeed, I am in favor of it. The Secretary of State has set forth in the hearing before the House committee the valuable ends to be subserved in the conference of American States. I believe his views are wise and just, and that we should seek in all befitting ways to get in closer trade communion with the sister republics of South and Central America.

But this method of appropriation is an exceedingly loose one. It will be observed that we are appropriating $60,000, in the discretion of the Secretary of State, for this international conference for the purpose of paying the expenses of delegates and their clerical assistants. It will also be observed that no number of delegates is mentioned; that no definition of their duties is attempted; that no term of service is indicated; that they are not made confirmatory by the Senate, and that the appropriation is unbounded by any of the definitions which should usually accompany appropriations.

OBJECT OF THE AMENDMENT NONSECTIONAL AND NONPARTISAN.

The amendment was added that the delegates shall be appointed so that, as far as practicable, the different sections of the country should be represented, for the reason that the committee thought the time had passed when that great section of the Union in the southern part of the Republic should take so little part in the great affairs of this nation. I am heartily in favor of that amendment, which I initiated, and while I neither seek nor suppose that I could at this juncture attain any large practical result, I hope to put in the minds of my colleagues in the Senate a fair view of a situation which ought to be recognized by whatever party is in power.

No partisan feelings actuate me, and I intend to appeal to none on the part of anybody. The facts must speak for themselves; and the fact is, Mr. President, that whatever may be its cause and whatever may be the method of its correction, there are some ten or twelve or more States in the American Union which have not a proper representative relation to this Government through official representatives in the higher spheres of political life.

WHY THE SOUTH IS NOT PROPORTIONATELY REPRESENTED IN THE HIGHER SPHERES OF POLITICAL LIFE.

Of course we all recognize that, in a general way, it is the result of a mighty revolution, a constitutional revolution, a sectional revolution, a social revolution, a revolution that swept away the ancient landmarks and produced new ones for the guidance of the American people. I am not here to complain of that revolution on one side or another. The sides of it have disappeared. They belong to ancient history. A whole generation of mankind has come upon the stage and passed from it since that revolution ended. The population of the United States has nearly trebled since that revolution ended. The youths of to-day who are looking toward the future of this country do not compute that revolution or what happened to produce it or who were in it as factors in their schemes of life.

What can be the impediment to the proper and fair representation of all the southern country in the high missions of political life? Unquestionably, Mr. President, it is in large measure if not altogether one of party relation. I shall discuss that aspect but lightly, for there is something in this question which is far above party relation. The fact could not be denied, and the man who asserted that there was not good material in all that southern country, intellectual, moral, patriotic, and available for any mission that this Government could bestow, would be looked upon as, and undoubtedly would be, a narrow-minded bigot. Those who belong to a political party that is not in sympathy on many principles with the party in power no doubt realize, and should realize, that the ruling party is under no political or party obligations to them. They can neither seek nor expect what are called "political favors."

But, Mr. President, is it not time that all of us were giving our attention to the fact that the things about which the American people differ make but a very small percentage of the great mass of American affairs, and that if you were to compare their differences to the matters in which they agree it would be as a fraction in contrast with a mighty whole number?

THE REMEDY.

I do not know that I would be capable, even were I to study to do so, to suggest any remedy that would fully reach the trouble. It has got to be found in the hearts and in the minds of men who hold ever in view the fundamental fact that this is the mightiest representative Republic of the world, that it was fabricated with a view of having its geographical parts fairly and fully represented in the Government autonomy and mechanism. As an ideal of human affairs and as a fabric of constructive genius, our Constitution was never surpassed in the cogitations or dreams of men. How, then, can we make the reality the nearer approach this scheme and this noble fancy of what our Government should be? Only by inculcating the spirit to do so, and only by doing so ourselves when we have the opportunity to do it.

CIVIL SERVICE AND THE MINOR POSITIONS ARE IN REPRESENTATIVE RELATIONS.

In that great structure of civil service which has largely taken possession of the administrative and minor portions of our Government the principle for which I contend was put into actuality and has taken representative and proportionate form. I much prefer to praise rather than to criticise, to commend rather than to blame, and many things have been recently transpiring which have so heartily my commendation and recognition that I am justified in referring to them.

In the minor departments of this Government, and under the rule of the party that is now in power, many of the States which do not give them a single electoral vote, and to which they can not at this time look for party ascendancy, are as fully, and sometimes more fully, represented in various bureaus and departments than those who are in accord with the party in power. I consider that to be a most worthy and noble fact in our political history. It is one that should have recognition and high respect from all Americans, whatever may be their political contacts and associations, as an indication of the subsidence of sectionalism.

IN WAR THE SOUTH REPRESENTED, AND SECTIONALISM DISAPPEARED.

There is another fact, Mr. President. Just as soon as the tocsin of war sounded in this land there was no section. If America had been comprehended in a ward or in a township, it could not have been more united with one thought nor more ready to stand up and to fight and to suffer and to die for one principle. Under the flag of the Union in the presence of an enemy all America was as one man.

And, Mr. President, the President of the United States was indeed the chief of a united army and of a whole people. There were no discriminations in the commissions granted. There was no looking over the page of ancient history to inquire what a man was thirty or forty or fifty years ago, unless, Mr. President, with a fine ideal of making it more pleasant to one who might suppose that he was liable to being ignored to accept a mission and discharge the responsibilities which his then situation seemed to suggest and to impose upon him. It was a great scene before the nations of all this earth when the American heart was touched by a great occasion. The electricity of patriotic thought found no nonconductor anywhere throughout the Republic, and geographical lines disappeared.

A STEP FORWARD.

So, then, Mr. President, it makes it unpleasant for me, when I see that so much that is noble and commendable has been done, to hold up any page in which to my own fancy the people south of the Potomac and stretching to the Mississippi and down to the Empire State of Texas have not that recognition in the higher walks of the public service which due representation ought to accord to them.

This matter before us now is comparatively a small one, but it is not a matter to be ignored. One step at a time must be taken in all advancements. We take one small step in this amendment.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE TO BE HELD IN JULY AT RIO DE JANEIRO AND THE DELEGATES THERETO.

In July the great South American Republic of Brazil is to entertain at Rio de Janeiro the delegates to an international conference of American States. That Republic has appropriated a half million dollars for that purpose; and when the delegates from the United States arrive there they will be met with the hospitality and generosity of a Republic which has extended open arms, and liberally provided to receive them.

How many delegates will go? The statute does not say. We learn through the hearings that it is in view to appoint five gentlemen. I have no objection to any one of them. No doubt each one of them is in his personality a most fitting selection. Two of them, though, are from the great city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois. One is from Pennsylvania. Another is the late minister to Panama. I believe he hails originally from the trans-Mississippi and now from New York. The other is the Porto Rican Delegate, not a Representative, in the Congress of the United States. Porto Rico is recognized as being in the United States, so far as having a delegate to attend an international convention or conference of American States is concerned. If that delegate can explain to them fully and exactly the status of Porto Rico in connection with the American Union, he will have a mind for jurisprudence and for expression such as our own country has not yet produced. I wish him a safe deliverance when he undertakes the exposition.

PORTO RICO REPRESENTED.

Mr. BACON. With the Senator's permission, I will call his attention to the fact that the Delegate from Porto Rico is not a citizen of the United States under our law. The act, if the Senator will pardon me, which organized the government of Porto Rico expressly excluded Porto Ricans from citizenship of the United States and denominated them citizens of Porto Rico.

Mr. DANIEL. Well, Mr. President, he is an attaché, or some sort of a citizen or subcitizen—brevet citizen, I suppose. He is a highly intelligent gentleman and speaks Spanish, and he would be an appropriate person, no doubt, individuality considered.

NO SOUTHERN OR WESTERN MAN A DELEGATE IN CONTEMPLATION.

I look in vain in this list or suggested list for any representative of that mighty domain that lies west of the Mississippi River; and as to the country bounded by the Gulf of Mexico and the Potomac, stretching to the Rio Grande, an American country, whose people speak English, I look in vain for the suggestion of a delegate.

Mr. President, no matter what anybody may say that is good or ill about the Republican party of this country, that it is a very great party they will not deny. It is a very able party also. It has in its councils and in its leaderships men of very broad and comprehensive minds, and no one knows better than myself, Mr. President, the fact that amongst its representatives are many men of real Americanism and of generous and noble hearts. It is to that class of men that I bring this fact for attention. I yield to none of them in my own American sentiments; and the people to whom I belong, and all those millions of splendid American people south of the Potomac, yield to none of them in ideals of patriotic duty or in readiness to serve this country in any sort of fashion, whether with honors or emoluments or in the heat and burden of service. Most happily for all of us, sir, the spirit of distrust has vanished, and the country knows that as well as we do. Though it took a little time, perhaps not unnaturally, to convince them that it is a fact, many of all sections have helped to produce that fact and can take credit and honor to themselves that such is the case.

Chicago, to which I have no manner of objection, is a city that contains many of the brightest intellects in this country. It is eminently fitting to send a man from Chicago or Illinois to this international conference; but Chicago is far on the very northern border of this country. If you have a strong arm, you can throw a rock from that point into the possessions of His Majesty King Edward VII in Canada. Nobody seems to be thought of as yet who is in all that vast region of territory west of the Mississippi River or south of the line a good deal above the line of the Potomac.

THE MOVEMENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION A WISE ONE.

Mr. President, I am in favor of this movement. It is the third international convention that is to be held of those South American republics. The Secretary of State, a large-minded, learned, and intelligent American, intends to go on a visit at the time of this international conference to those southern American countries, to their capitals, to mingle amongst those people, and through those delegations to attempt to make closer trade and social relations between them and this North American Republic. We have been seeking in small and tentative ways to do this since 1828; but the time is ripe, in the mighty conflict of nations for trade, for America to stretch forth her far-reaching hands to enlarge her commerce wherever she can; and those of us who are not in the close political association of those gentlemen who are in line with the present powers that be hope that they will take recognition of the fact that these thoughts are going through the people of the southern section as well as through the people of the northern section, and through the West as well as in the South. When the American nations are convened to meet those who represent this Republic it is right and just that all parts of this Republic, at least in broad sectional relations, should be brought in contact with them and have the opportunities of that enlargement of view and that information as to conditions which are so helpful to any community or to any people.

NEVER LESS IMPEDIMENT TO FULL REPRESENTATION OF EVERY PART OF THE COUNTRY.

The people of the South, Mr. President, were for many years, for the most part, and remain largely an agricultural people. They stuck to the fields and the woods and the plantations longer than any other portion of the American people, who are now more diversifying their industries and their pursuits. But the wave, Mr. President, of the new régime is rolling over the South. Cities and towns of my own State, as well as those of other Southern States, if you could have looked at them twenty-five or thirty years ago and were to look at them to-day, you would not recognize the same communities or conditions, and everywhere modern ideas and individual thrift are prevalent. In all of these Southern States the people from all sections are mingling together, attracted by the affinities of occupation and industry which are opening up to them, and there are unfolding boundless resources and opportunities nowhere on earth surpassed. There was never a day in the history of what we sometimes call the Anglo-Saxon people—English-speaking people, and here American people—in which the assimilation of the whole body politic was proceeding either so rapidly or so wholesomely as now. There was never a day in the history of this country when there was less impediment to the full representation of every part of the United States in anything that concerns the nation.

SHALL THE APPROPRIATION BE INCREASED?

I have been meditating, Mr. President, as to whether I would not offer as an amendment to this bill an increase of this appropriation by $10,000. I have no disposition either to suggest to or to interfere with the President or Secretary of State in any plans they may have for the betterment of our commercial relations and for bringing the American Republic and the South American republics into closer relations. On the contrary, I am in sympathy with their efforts.

THE CONSIDERATIONS FOR THE CONFERENCE ADDUCED BY THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

Let me read here some remarks of the Secretary of State, Mr. Root, before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and a few extracts of observations made in their hearings. Mr. Root said:

The Brazilian Government has appropriated half a million dollars for the expenses of the proposed conference. A committee of the board is now very actively engaged in the preparation of a programme of subjects for discussion. The committee meet this afternoon. It will include a number of subjects of very great interest to this country and to all other American countries, and I think that the work of the Bureau of American Republics, the existence of the international union, and the holding of these conferences afford altogether the best means of breaking up the comparative isolation of this country from the other countries of America and establishing relations between us and them in place of the relations—the rather exclusive relations—that have existed hitherto between them and Europe.

Our relation with them has been largely a political relation, while, on the other hand, their racial ties of race and language and inherited customs and usage—the relations of which have come from the investment of great amounts of European capital in their country, which have come from the establishment of numerous and convenient lines of communication between them and Europe—have made the whole trend of South American trade and social relations and personal relations subsist with Europe rather than with the United States. So that, while we occupy the political attitude of warning Europe off the premises in Central and South America under the Monroe doctrine, we are comparatively strangers to them, and the Europeans hold direct relations with them.

Now, there is, I think, a strong and genuine desire on the part of the South American statesmen—and they have very many able ones—to promote a greater knowledge on the part of their people of the people of the United States, and on the part of our people a greater knowledge of the southern republics, and to promote greater intercourse. Just at this time, of course, the great increase of capital in the United States is on the threshold of seeking investment abroad. We are about at the close of the period during which all our capital and all our energy were engrossed at home, and I can see in the State Department an enormous increase of business relations between Americans and other countries. They are going into construction work, and they are pushing their way, making banking transactions, and all over Central and South America capital is ready to go. I take it to be the proper function of government to help create situations of friendly relations and good understanding, which will make it possible for capital to go.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The banking question is one of the most serious drawbacks that I found in South America. Everything, no matter how small the transaction was, had to go around through the bank of England and come to New York—everything.

Secretary ROOT. English and German bankers and commercial establishments, English and German built railroads, and everything is that way. It seemed to me that I could not do any more useful work to the country for the promotion of American trade interests and at the same time for the promotion of these relations which tend to maintain peace and harmony than to foster and advance this tendency, which finds its expression through the Union of American Republics and these successive conferences.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. One thing I find, Mr. Secretary, which you can correct easily, I think. The Germans and English made those people believe that our ulterior purpose was to cover them in, and that under this Monroe doctrine, and that that was all we held it for, to put our fingers on them one of these days and draw them into the net. That idea has got in among the common people. I found it so. Crespo, the President of Venezuela at that time, was very honest about it and told me about it. That was a great trouble. Their trade was with Germany and France. They believed we were under cover their enemy, though openly their friend.

Mr. LITTAUER. Has it not been natural for them to trade with Europe, because they first got their financial capital from Europe, and their means of communication were all in that direction? We had no capital to send to them at that time, and we have had no trade with them sufficient to warrant lines of communication.

Secretary ROOT. Yes. But I think we are just on the threshold of a different state of things.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think so, too.

Secretary ROOT. And I think we ought to use all proper means to open the doors. Accordingly we have sent in this recommendation, and, rather assuming that Congress would not reverse its established policy, expressed in statute after statute, and would not retire from the obligations that the United States has entered upon in this union of American Republics, we have gone on, and while there have not been any appointments made, we have designated the people who will be appointed, if you will permit us.

Mr. LITTAUER. What power have these gentlemen so designated? The power to enter into discussion?

Secretary ROOT. The power to enter into discussion; yes.

Mr. LITTAUER. What else—a power to commit us in any way?

Secretary ROOT. No. They will have a right of referendum, but no power to commit us to anything that will not require two further steps before it can commit us—first, the approval of the President, and next, the approval of the Senate.

The Secretary of State recommended an appropriation of $100,000 for the purposes of the conference; and the views he set forth, and which I have quoted, show in brief the considerations and objects that actuate the Administration.

The committee of the House cut down the estimate and the Secretary could get along, he says, with $60,000, but I am meditating whether we had not better increase that reduced sum.

THE ALMOST PARADOXICAL STATUS.

Our present status is almost paradoxical. With one voice we proclaim the American doctrine of Monroe, and we say to foreign nations, "Keep your hands off; do not interfere with these sister republics of ours." Then, Mr. President, our relation to the matter takes a sudden and mighty subsidence. Other nations have closer trade relations with them than we have. They fill the markets of Europe with their productions, and the markets of Europe send them back their productions, while we, who geographically, who politically, who constitutionally and historically have the closest relations with them that we could have to foreign nations, are the least connected by the material actualities of life.

OBJECT IN INCREASE OF APPROPRIATION.

If it would meet with favor of Senators upon the other side, I should move to amend this provision by increasing the appropriation. The increased appropriation would be made for the reason, in so far as I am suggesting it, that the Secretary of State or the President might not be embarrassed as to the selections which have been premeditated and which may, perhaps, though I do not know, have been so mentioned as to make it a matter of trouble or annoyance if different names were brought forward. There were twelve delegates to the last international conference, held in Mexico. We appropriated $25,000, and the amount afterwards had to be doubled out of the contingent fund. I have no idea that the President or the Secretary of State would object to seeing on the board of American delegates men of the West or men of the South, or such a man or men of the West or South as might be appropriately put on this international conference. I do not attribute to either of them any harsh or unpatriotic views upon the subject. While I would not embarrass them or interfere with them, it might be better to enlarge the appropriation to some extent.

It is a great trade that we are going in competition for, to which we intend to reach forth by all the American agencies that we can employ. There are also great international questions to be considered. What is worth doing at all is worth doing well, and ought to be done, not to the satisfaction of a small portion or a sectional portion of the American people, but to the satisfaction of all of them. This is a time, Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very glad to yield to the Senator for an inquiry.

Mr. HALE. I was going to make a suggestion.

Mr. DANIEL. I will be glad to hear the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. HALE. The appropriation provided for in the bill is $60,000. Appreciating the force of what the Senator says, I am willing that the amount shall be increased to $75,000, which will give opportunity for two more delegates to be appointed. If we can dispose of the matter in that way, after consultation with other members of the committee, I will accept such a suggestion.

INCREASE OF APPROPRIATION PROPOSED AND PASSED.

Mr. DANIEL. I move, then, Mr. President, to strike out the word "sixty" and insert "seventy-five," so that the appropriation will be $75,000 instead of $60,000.

Mr. HALE. In line 6, on page 2, before the word "dollars," strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy-five."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read the third time, but the Chair will regard the vote on ordering the bill to a third reading as reconsidered. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, before the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out "sixty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

To meet the actual and necessary expenses of the delegates of the United States to the Third International Conference of American States, to be held at the city of Rio de Janeiro, beginning on the 21st day of July, 1906, and of their salaried clerical assistants, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State, and to continue available during the fiscal year 1907, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I think that will cover the whole thing.

Mr. DANIEL. I thank the Senator from Maine for his suggestion. I appreciate it and the favor it has met with.

CONCLUSION.

Now, Mr. President, I shall bring my remarks to a speedy close. I was starting a sentence when the agreeable suggestion of the Senator from Maine was made, and I would rather finish it. I was simply going to add to my remarks this observation, that at this time the eyes of this country are turned southward more than ever before in our history. The building of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama is in process. Centuries of contemplation preceded the effort; decades may wait upon its success. That we can not tell. Be it so or not, Galveston, New Orleans, Mobile, Tampa, Savannah, Charleston, Wilmington, Norfolk, Portsmouth, Newport News, Richmond, Petersburg, Atlanta, Vicksburg, Memphis, St. Louis—I name almost at random some of the southern cities along the seaboard or trade lines south of us—have vast communities behind them. They have their faces turned to the Gulf of Mexico, to the canal, and to South America and the future. It is timely, therefore, that while we are looking to the widening of our commercial and social relations and to the cultivation of better political understandings with our neighboring republics, we should also turn our eyes inwardly to the people of our own States and our own homes and have this a Republic in representative unison in all our contemplations.

It was out of that country, on the right bank of the Potomac, that came the author of the Monroe doctrine. The people of that country are just as true to that doctrine as was Adams, of Massachusetts, when he was conferring and advising and, in a measure, guiding the hand that threw the bolt "heard around the world."

Again I thank the Senator from Maine for his gracious suggestion. I am gratified also with the favor the idea has met with, and I will not longer detain the Senate on this subject.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read the third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE YAZOO RIVER (MISSISSIPPI) BRIDGE.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of a short bill, which has passed the House of Representatives and has been reported favorably without amendment by the Senate Committee on Commerce, to build a bridge across the Yazoo River. It will take only a minute. It is House bill 11026.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11026) to authorize the counties of Holmes and Washington to construct a bridge across Yazoo River, Mississippi.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, although I joined in reporting the pending bill from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I do not regard it as a comprehensive measure. I think that now is the opportune time to secure full and comprehensive action upon the subject of interstate commerce, and that we should not content ourselves with such fragmentary legislation as we have hitherto enacted.

I believe that in legislating upon the subject we should, in the first place, create the great carrying corporations that operate between States. We should then provide against overcapitalization. We should provide for a simple system of taxation by the States that would be mathematically certain in its computation, and we should fix a definite return to the stockholders upon the capital invested. We should also take into consideration the relations of the employees of the railroads to these corporations. We should provide for an insurance fund against accidents and old age, and we should also provide for a conciliation of disputes between carriers and their employees. We should frankly recognize the economic necessity of consolidation and combination and the monopolistic character of the business, and regulate all with a proper regard for the interests of the public served by it, the property rights of the capital employed in it, and the human rights of the labor employed by it.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER.

There can be no question as to the power of Congress. The power is granted in those sections of the Constitution which provide for the national defense, for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and between the States, and for the establishment of post-offices and post-roads.

In the exercise of these powers it is absolutely essential that there should be highways. Canals and railroads are highways. The United States, therefore, has the power either to construct such highways or to authorize their construction by agents; and in doing the latter it can create national corporations for that purpose. It is not necessary to cite the authorities, for the power is without question and has been exercised frequently.

Under these powers we are to-day constructing the great Panama Canal and will operate it. Under these powers we have acquired the Panama Railroad and are operating it. Under these powers we incorporated the Pacific railways—the Union Pacific, the Atlantic and Pacific, and the Texas Pacific Railway, the two former running in Territories of the United States, the latter from a point in the State of Texas to a point in the State of California. Under these powers we incorporated the National Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua. Under these powers we are to-day in the process of incorporating the proposed canal between Lake Erie and the Ohio River, called, I believe, The Erie and Ohio Canal, which is intended to join the Great Lakes with the Ohio River and the Gulf. The bill for that purpose has passed the House almost without opposition and will probably pass here without serious opposition. The Nation, therefore, under the granted powers, has the right and the power either to construct these great highways, or to authorize their construction by corporations created by itself.

SHALL THE MACHINE BE STATE OR NATIONAL?

Now, it is true that the same machine is used for both State commerce and interstate commerce. The same railroad accommodates both. State commerce is under the control of the State. Interstate commerce is under the control of the nation. And obviously it would involve economic error to provide for the State commerce a separate machine from that employed in interstate commerce. The same railroads must be employed for both. But the corporation must be created either by the State or by the National Government. If it is created by the State, then the National Government uses a State agency in the exercise of its power over national commerce. If it is created by the National Government, then the State uses a national agency in the exercise of its control over State commerce.

The reason why these corporations have been created by the States is that in the first place the commerce contemplated was entirely within the boundaries of a State, from a point in one State to another point in the same State. But these purely State railroads have now grown into great national systems under conditions of great embarrassment and difficulty; and one can but admire the genius of the men, who struggling against inadequate laws, have been able to build up these great systems of national highways, intended for national commerce, and embracing the commerce of numerous States and some of them the commerce of the entire Union.

Thus far the nation has not exercised its full powers as to railroads. For many years it exercised no powers whatever, and it is only within the last twenty years that the constant growth of interstate commerce, as compared with purely local or State commerce, has forced the question upon public consideration. Railroads at first were purely State institutions intended only for transportation within State boundaries, but they have now, through consolidation, merger, lease, or community of interest, grown into great institutions of national scope and character, whose traffic is conducted without regard to State boundaries—whose capital embraces over one-tenth of the wealth of the country, and whose employees number about one-twelfth of its effective labor.

Had such growth been contemplated doubtless a national incorporation act would have been provided, but as it is the growth has been accomplished under inadequate and lax State legislation, under which simplicity of organization and operation is impossible. The weakness of all national legislation thus far has been that it has not at the very start created national machinery for incorporating the artificial beings called upon to exercise the great national function of interstate transportation. It has been content, while permitting State corporations to exercise this function, to regulate its operation. The result has been that State machines are performing national functions, and are inadequate to do so without complexity of organization, baffling to the mind of a regulating Interstate Commerce Commission.

As the result of this experience legislation has been a growth. Had we contemplated in the first instance that national commerce would absolutely dwarf State commerce, and that both State and national commerce would be conducted upon these great machines of transportation, we would doubtless have seen the wisdom of having the greater sovereignty create the machine that is to do the business of both and not have the lesser sovereignty, whose jurisdiction is confined to a contracted area, create that machine. The interstate commerce is three-fourths of the commerce of the entire country. The State commerce is only one-fourth. We were told in the Nebraska case that of all of the commerce of the railroads of that State one-twentieth only was State commerce, and all the balance was interstate. It is clear, therefore, that we ought to have national machinery for the transaction of this commerce, that this is the time for it, and that we will never have a better opportunity for creating it.

The passage of a national incorporation act would require the addition of only fifteen or twenty sections to this bill. The pending bill simply provides for the regulation of rates. We could, right in this bill, furnish the machinery for the incorporation of national corporations, and we could make this legislation either coercive or persuasive. In my judgment, at first it should be made merely persuasive. Later on it might be deemed wise to apply coercive legislation, as we did when the national banks were created, by taxing the State note issues 10 per cent. In using the term "coercive," I do not wish to imply that Congress could force State railroads to come under national charters. What I mean is that we could so cripple them in their operations in interstate commerce as to make them eager to avail themselves of national charters, and even then, of course, the consent of the States to the change would be required—a consent which I believe could be obtained with as little difficulty as that now obtained in the various States by corporations organized under the laws of sister States.

This coercion could be applied in different ways. It could be applied by absolutely preventing State corporations from engaging in interstate commerce, or it could be applied by imposing such a tax upon the commerce carried by such corporations as to be practically prohibitory of their engaging in it. But, in my judgment, the legislation now should be merely persuasive and should offer such obvious advantages to these great systems, whilst at the same time properly protecting the public, as to induce them to incorporate under its provisions.

MUST CONGRESS FIX THE STANDARD FOR RATES?

Mr. President, as to the pending bill, it seems to me it is weak in that it does not provide a rule which is to control the Interstate Commerce Commission in regulating rates, and I have some doubt as to whether we can, under the Constitution, grant this power to a mere administrative commission unless we prescribe the rule, so that their action will be largely one of computation and mere administration, not involving legislative discretion. It is contended that the legislature can delegate this power to a commission by providing a rule or standard for its action, and this contention seems to be upheld by a great many decisions relating to the States.

Now, what rule or standard does this bill provide? It simply declares that the rates shall be just and reasonable, and it is said that is the rule which the Commission is to follow. But Congress could not fix, or confer upon a commission the power to fix, unjust and unreasonable rates. Under the limitations of the Constitution the only power Congress itself has is to fix just and reasonable rates, and when it transfers that power to a commission, does it not transfer to the Commission all the power it has?

It may be that the courts will finally hold that it is so difficult for a legislative body to exercise this power directly that it is warranted in creating an administrative board for the purpose. If that is so, legislation of this kind will be sustained, in my judgment, not upon the ground that it fixes the rule for the Commission's action, but upon the ground that Congress can grant to a commission all the power that it has in fixing the rates for interstate commerce.

VALUATION OF RAILROADS AND RETURN.

It seems to me that in this very bill, outside of the question of national incorporation, we could provide the standard and we could follow the rule laid down in Smyth v. Ames, the Nebraska Case (169 U. S., 546), in which the Supreme Court says:

> We hold, however, that the basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public. And in order to ascertain that value, the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under the particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. We do not say that there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property. What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth.

We could provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission should value the property of all these railroads, should make a present valuation, and to that should be added such additional investments as may be made in the future. We would then have the basis of value. We could also provide in this bill that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in exercising the power of fixing rates, should so adjust rates as to yield a return upon such value of not less than a certain percentage—not less than 5 or 6 per cent or not less than 4 per cent or more than 6 per cent.

If the bill provides the machinery by which the value of the railway property can be ascertained and also fixes the return upon that value, we then have a rule established by Congress which involves simply mathematical computation upon the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Of course, if we fix the rule for the exercise of the judgment of the Commission the bill would not be so open to constitutional objections as it is now.

Mr. President, I prefer that valuation of the property of these railroad corporations which would be exhibited in a fair capitalization. I should prefer legislation which would provide for the national incorporation of these great railways and the issue of bonds and stock representing their actual value and cash outlay, so that wherever the question of the regulation of rates comes up, either by State commissions or national commission, the factor of value would be omnipresent in the capitalization of the roads in stock and bonds.

But if we are not to have comprehensive legislation of that kind, then the next best thing is to provide in this bill for a valuation of the roads by the Interstate Commerce Commission. A valuation has already been made by the Census Bureau, based simply upon the existing income of the roads, and they have made a valuation of about eleven billion dollars, I believe, approaching within a billion or so of the existing capitalization of the roads, which it is claimed is exaggerated.

Mr. FORAKER. Within 10 per cent.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Within 10 per cent, the Senator from Ohio says. Now that is based upon income, but there can be another kind of valuation, following the principles laid down in Smyth v. Ames, by considering first the actual cost of reproduction; second, the cost of the road to the corporation, third, the market value of the stock and bonds, and fourth, the value as determined by existing income, for the Supreme Court says that all these factors can be taken into consideration.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission, then, should be authorized in this bill to provide for the employment of experts to make a valuation of the roads, we would have the basis for sound action in the regulation of rates; and if we should add to that the legislative will as to the return upon the capital invested, we would have two factors in the problem determined by Congress. We would have the rule established and the rest would be a mere matter of mathematical calculation.

VALUATION THROUGH NATIONAL INCORPORATION.

So far as this bill is concerned, I would suggest that a provision be inserted in it for ascertaining the value of the railroads engaged in interstate commerce and that a provision also be made fixing the return in the shape of interest upon such value.

But I believe that we should also add to this bill provisions for the national incorporation of railways.

In such additional provisions we could declare that no stocks or bonds should be issued, either for construction, extension, or improvement of such railways, or for the purchase of connecting or intersecting lines except for full value in money or property, or without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. In this way we could guard against overcapitalization.

The President in his message has called attention to the evils of overcapitalization in the following words:

> Of these abuses perhaps the chief, although by no means the only one, is overcapitalization—generally itself the result of dishonest promotion—because of the myriad evils it brings in its train; for such capitalization often means an inflation that invites business panic; it always conceals the true relation of the profit earned to the capital actually invested, and it creates a burden of interest payments which is a fertile cause of improper reduction in or limitation of wages; it damages the small investor, discourages thrift, and encourages gambling and speculation; while, perhaps, worst of all is the trickiness and dishonesty which it implies—for harm to morals is worse than any possible harm to material interests, and the debauchery of politics and business by great dishonest corporations is far worse than any actual material evil they do the public.

This measure does not reach this abuse, and it should be amended so as to prevent it.

DUTY OF CONGRESS TO FIX THE RETURN.

We could also limit in this bill the rate of interest to be received by the investors upon such valuation, and thus in the future the great increase of business which is induced by the extension of the railroads and the expansion of commerce will tend automatically either to the betterment of the roads or to a reduction in rates.

It has been said that it is unfair to limit in any way the returns of these corporations; that we do not limit the returns of people generally in business, or of corporations engaged in business. But we must recollect that ordinary occupations and businesses are not of public nature, and the public has no right to regulate or control them. This regulation and control arises from the fact that the highways are public highways, the function a public function, and the Government simply entrusts the conduct of this function to certain agencies, and all the agent is entitled to under the decisions is a fair return upon the amount he has invested. If that is a fact, it is competent for Congress to fix that return and not leave it to chance or accident.

Beyond this, if we are careless regarding the return, and allow a corporation to receive 10, 15 or 20 per cent instead of 5 or 6 per cent interest, the result will be that the stocks will rise in the market, their value being based upon income, and if you should permit the $10,000,000,000 now claimed to be invested in these great highways in this country to receive an interest of 10 per cent instead of an interest of 5 per cent, you would find immediately in the market that these securities would be quoted at $20,000,000,000, and if you allow interest at 15 per cent you would find the market valuation would be $30,000,000,000, and if you allow 20 per cent you would find the market value would be $40,000,000,000.

Now, then, are we to assume that at different stages in the regulation of rates the value of these properties is to vary with the income? If we do there will be no limit to their value, for if there is no restriction on the return there will be no limit to the value. If to-day these railroads are valued at $10,000,000,000, based upon existing income, they must be valued at $20,000,000,000 if the return is doubled. Thus will the value increase proportionally to the income, and if we do not apply a fair restrictive regulation of the rate of interest we will bring about a serious readjustment of values all over the country.

The cry will be raised by investors that the Government has permitted the securities to reach this high value, just as it is claimed to-day that the value of these properties is not necessarily the value actually put into them by experts, but the value based upon income. The return must be fixed therefore either by the Commission or by Congress, and Congress is just as competent to fix it as is the Commission. State legislatures already exercise the power of regulation over the rate of interest. Throughout the United States the legal rate of interest does not exceed 6 per cent.

Those laws are intended to guard against usury. A law of this kind is intended to guard against extortion. Unless the return is fixed by somebody, either by the Commission or by the Congress, we will have varying valuations running through the years.

AUTOMATIC ADJUSTMENT V. COMMISSION ADJUSTMENT.

Mr. President, it seems to me exceedingly important that we should fix this rule of valuation and return, simply because it will work automatically toward a gradual reduction in rates. I believe myself that under the pending bill the Commission will be overwhelmed with work. I have been impressed with the evidence of the traffic managers before our committee, the ceaseless vigilance which they employ in moving the traffic, in providing a market place for the surplus of the country which they serve, and in bringing from the outside the things needed by the communities which they serve.

They have many thousand men in that service—the great traffic managers at the head of each system, the assistant traffic managers, the district traffic managers, and then every agent and every station is a part of this great machinery for the adjustment of rates, not simply as a matter of profit to the corporation, but as a matter of serving the requirements of the communities through which the railroads run. In this adjustment much elasticity of action is required.

I do not believe that any board of seven men can exercise intelligently all the powers that are exercised by these thousands of competent, skilled, trained traffic managers and their assistants, and I believe if the Commission attempts it, it will be overwhelmed, and in the end it will either be inert and inactive, or it will bring the adjustment of rates practically to a mileage basis.

It is true that these rates are to be adjusted only upon complaint; but all the rates can be complained of. An entire schedule can be complained of. We are told that within a single year one hundred and sixty thousand different schedules have been filed in the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission, each one of these schedules involving varying classifications and varying rates. Any one or all of these schedules can be challenged, and if challenged the challenge must receive the consideration of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Will it be possible for it then to consider all the cases? It will be obliged to adopt some rule, and the easiest rule in the end will be the mileage rule, with modifications according to distance.

The advantage of fixing a return of a certain percentage upon a valuation of the property is that it protects the investors in these great public securities, and it forces a limitation of profits, so that automatically, as the receipts of the company increase, the rates will be reduced.

All that the average investor, outside of the speculator, asks is a fair return upon his money. The great banking institutions in New York that negotiate the securities of these great corporations rely upon other people's money for the exercise of their power. We have had illustrations of that in recent investigations. Hundreds of millions of dollars collected from all over the country by the insurance companies, or the savings of the people in savings banks and trust companies, supply the funds which are invested in a large proportion of these securities.

The average investor to whom these securities are presented looks simply to the rate of interest, and if he gets 4 or 5 per cent he is willing to pay par for the securities. All the real investors require is a fair return of from 4 or 5 per cent, and the proposed limitation of profits is absolutely fair to them.

ELIMINATES THE SPECULATIVE ELEMENT.

It is said that if this return is limited there will be no inducement to these great railway promoters to extend the roads; that it is the speculative idea that attracts them into these operations. That may possibly be true as to the great promoters who have made millions and hundreds of millions out of these operations, but it is not true as to the people themselves. All they expect is 4 or 5 per cent, and they are willing to put their money into any investment that will secure that return.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that in order to stimulate enterprise in this country in railroad building it is necessary to hold up before some man or some set of men a prize of from ten million to one hundred million dollars for the operation. I think that if we protect the bondholders and stockholders by fixing a return of this kind, it will lead to the elimination of the speculative element in railroad operations, but I do not regard that as of consequence, for the speculative element has little to do with material railroad building. You will find that the men who really conduct this business, the men who really build the railroads, the men who really manage them, are men of moderate means, who are content with moderate salaries, and yet do their work faithfully and well.

We find in the Government service to-day—in the scientific branches of the Government, such as the Geological Survey—the highest standard of efficiency and energy, accompanied by a public spirit which seems to elevate their action above that of men not employed in the public service. I have not the slightest doubt but that railroad enterprises will be just as well conducted without retaining the aid of the speculative element.

TAXES SHOULD BE CERTAIN.

In such an incorporation act we could also provide with certainty as to taxes. One of the great difficulties of the existing condition is that although these great systems are really national, embracing in their operations a number of States, they are subject to the varying rules of forty-five different States as to taxation. In some States the assessment is made at the assessed value simply of the tracks and the right of way. In other States the assessment takes into consideration the value of the franchise.

In some States it is contended that the assessment should be the combined market value of the stocks and bonds. In addition to all this the stocks and bonds themselves in the hands of their holders can be separately assessed and taxed, a form of double taxation.

We have in this country about $12,000,000,000 of railroad stocks and bonds. The market value is, say, about $10,000,000,000. If the highest rule obtains, these railroads could be assessed for $10,000,000,000, and they would have to pay an average tax of 1½ per cent upon that value, or $150,000,000.

The railroads to-day are paying $56,000,000 per annum. If this rule, which has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, were to prevail throughout the country the taxes of the railroads would be immediately raised from $56,000,000 to $150,000,000 per annum, an increase of about $100,000,000.

One hundred million dollars is 1 per cent upon the market value of the entire bonds and stocks of the country. That would be immdiately taken out of the returns to the stockholders unless the rates were so increased as to make up the extra tax charge. So if you raise the taxes from $56,000,000 to $150,000,000, the taxes which the public receive, then you must increase the rates to the extent of $100,000,000 so that the corporations can pay these taxes or else you must take the $100,000,000 out of the profits of the stockholders and diminish their return to that extent below the normal rate of interest.

But under the existing system the States could not only tax the railroads themselves $150,000,000 annually, thus trebling their taxes, but they could assess every bond and stock in the hands of the holders, for they are, under the laws, regarded as personal property and subject to taxation. It is true that they generally escape assessment, but if they were assessed at their market value, $10,000,000,000, it would mean that $150,000,000 more in taxes could be secured from them.

If this system were carried out to its logical conclusion, where would there be any security for the stockholders? With $150,000,000 taken from the corporations of which they are stockholders and bondholders and $150,000,000 taken annually from the bondholders and stockholders individually as owners of these securities, it would be utterly impossible for us to get people to invest in railway securities; and yet this wide range of taxation is possible under existing conditions; and it is a fruitful source of evasion, fraud, and political corruption.

WHY RAILROADS ARE IN POLITICS.

The railroads find it utterly impossible to keep out of politics simply because their property is between the upper and nether millstone and can be ground to destruction between the rate-regulating power and the taxing power of the public. In the famous case of Munn v. Illinois the doctrine was first asserted in this country by the United States Supreme Court that where a person devotes his property to a public use he grants to the public an interest in that use and must submit to regulation by the public; that if he is dissatisfied with the regulation he can discontinue the use, but so long as he continues the use he must submit to the regulation. In answer to the objection that such legislative power could be abused the court stated that the only remedy for legislative abuses was at the polls. The railroads have been at the polls ever since. Their taxes are a matter of political control. Their rates are a matter of political control. How can we expect $10,000,000,000 to keep out of politics when that $10,000,000,000 is completely subject to political control in every State of the Union?

It is absolutely essential, therefore, for the railroads to be in politics, and they go into politics as they go into everything else, in a systematic and businesslike way. There is no sentiment about it. They go into politics to protect their property, and they seize as swiftly as they can the entire political machinery of a State.

It is easier to do that than it is to try to influence the people at the polls. What chance has a great corporation at the polls in a contest with the people? They are compelled to be in politics, but they can only be influential in politics by indirection. They deem it, therefore, absolutely essential to seize wherever they can the political machinery of both parties.

With their ramifications, with their army of lawyers, traffic managers, and agents in every community, and with their 1,200,000 employees—about one-tenth of the effective labor of this country—they have all the factors of a strong political machine, for it is evident to one who has had experience in these matters that although the men employed by the railroads often have disputes with the railroads regarding their hours and compensation, yet that whatever their disputes may be they always stand in with the railroads when the common fund from which wages and dividends are paid is in danger.

We have had an illustration of that in this legislation. The employees of the railroads throughout the country have petitioned Congress against the regulation of rates upon the ground that it may endanger their compensation; and whenever it is known that the man offering himself for a public office is opposed to a railroad, either upon the matter of taxation or upon the matter of rates, it is not a difficult thing for the railroad to array all of its employees against such a man. So the railroads have been invited to go to the polls, and they are going to the polls in the only effective way, by controlling the political machinery of local conventions and of State conventions, and even the national conventions themselves.

There is not a man who is familiar with national conventions who does not know how large a factor the railroads have been in selecting delegates to them. We will find that to be the case hereafter, when we give this extraordinary and unrestrained power to a commission, giving it the full discretion that Congress itself has, without imposing any rule whatever of protection to the railroads. We will find them showing great activity in national politics and in the election of Presidents, as they have done in the election of mayors, of boards of supervisors, of county commissioners, of governors, of boards of equalization, and of State commissions.

It seems to me that that is an additional reason why we should put in this bill the rule that is to guide the Commission in its work, for it may be that one of these days this Commission will be a controlled commission, just as the State commissions have been in many instances. We can easily imagine a contest in either party where two or three men of equal ability, equal capacity, and of equal popularity are before a national convention as candidates for the Presidency. We can imagine how the railroads, massing their power for one candidate, may secure him the nomination, and we can imagine how the understanding might be that the railroads would be consulted as to the selection of this Interstate Commerce Commission. Of course it would be done in the most delicate way; such things are always done in a delicate way; but when a man receives the support of a great interest in a convention for so high a nomination and accepts it, the chances are that his judgment will be in some degree swayed by that fact.

Then we will assume that the national conventions of both parties have met and selected their candidates, the contest is a close one and the candidates are equally popular before the country. We can imagine how effective the railroad strength would be if turned over to one of those candidates, and we can understand how under such conditions the railroads might not find it difficult to secure assurances, directly or indirectly, as to the composition of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The character of the men appointed might be above reproach, but it is easy to understand how in the end the appointment of men of a certain inertia, inactivity, indisposition to move or to act, might condemn the Commission to uselessness. On the other hand it is possible that in periods of excitement the Commission might be composed of prejudiced and violent men, who would imperil the interests of investors.

So it seems to me incumbent upon us, in the common interest, to put in this bill fixed rules governing taxation and return on capital, so that the law itself will adjust with certainty the relations of the carriers to the public, protecting the carriers from spoliation and the public from extortion.

Now, Mr. President, in this matter of taxation, to which I was referring, I think that taxation should be absolutely certain, so that the railroads will know what they have to pay, so that the States will know what they are to receive, and in order that the railroads may be protected from the blackmailers and the cranks and the honest reformers throughout the entire country, each of whom is seeking to change the existing system of taxation in every locality and in every State, some men honest and probably right in their views, some of them cranks, some of them joining with the reformers and with the cranks simply for the purpose of blackmailing. We have recently had evidence of the kaleidoscopic character of railroad taxation by the States. A few days ago the Post stated that Governor Dawson of West Virginia was in Washington making inquiries as to the recent census valuation of railroads in West Virginia with a view to tax reform in that State. Similar movements are on foot in many of the States and the Supreme Court has recently handed down a decision affirming a recent statute of Michigan which trebles the existing railroad taxes of that State.

It is too much to demand of human nature to expect the railroads under those conditions to keep out of politics. All of us who have been familiar with politics know of conventions where it was whispered around at the very beginning of the session that the railroads demanded the tax commission, or the railroad commission, or both, and where the party managers knew they had a fight on their hands if they did not accede. We will find these same conditions extending to national politics if we do not take care.

A FAIR AND UNIFORM RULE OF TAXATION.

Now, what is a fair rule of taxation? I think it is generally agreed that the fairest rule is a percentage tax upon gross receipts. A tax of four per cent upon all the gross receipts of all the railroads of the country, which now aggregate about $2,000,000,000, would be $80,000,000. A tax of 5 per cent would yield $100,000,000. The present taxes paid by all the railroads amount to about $56,000,000, or about 3 per cent upon their gross receipts. Here let me say that these railroads, forced into politics to protect themselves against excessive taxation, finally end in evading taxation themselves. Having got the power, having secured the party machinery, having secured control of the officials who control taxes, they naturally seek to diminish their own taxes, and so, though originally going into politics for protection, they remain in politics for profit, and seek to escape their fair proportion of the burdens of government.

As to a gross-receipt tax, a tax of 3, 4, or 5 per cent upon the gross receipts is mathematically ascertainable. The gross receipts are published every year by the Interstate Commerce Commission. There is no way of concealing them. The tax would be a matter of mere computation, and would not involve the exercise of discretion by the taxing officials of the various States, as the present system does.

The National Government can, in incorporating interstate railroads, either exempt them as national instrumentalities from State taxation or it can fix the rule for their taxation by the States.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL INSTRUMENTALITIES—POWER OF CONGRESS TO FIX RULE OF TAXATION BY STATES.

When the Government condemns for public use or constructs a post-road, that moment the post-road is free from State taxation. If the Government buys real estate and builds a post-office, that moment the real estate and building are exempt from State taxation. If the National Government should construct railroads for the purpose of carrying out its granted powers, such railroads would be exempt from State taxation, just as post-offices and custom-houses are, and just as post-roads would be if built. If it intrusts such work to a corporation created by itself, the corporation is the agent for the purpose of carrying out governmental powers, and none of its powers or operations can be taxed by a State. If it selects certain property as the instrumentality or means through which its powers are to be exercised, such property would also be exempt from State taxation, for just as the powers and the operations of the Government agent would be exempt from all local taxation, so also would be the property selected as the chosen instrument for the exercise of those powers. The powers and operations would be exempt without any express declaration to that effect by Congress. A different rule would probably apply to the property selected as the chosen instrument for the exercise of a national power. In that case it would be necessary to show unmistakably that the property was selected as the instrumentality, and that it was the purpose of Congress that it should be taken out of the domain of State taxation.

The proper organization of a system of transportation is just as essential to the welfare of the people as is the creation of a proper financial system. In the early history of the country it was determined to establish a United States bank to promote the fiscal operations of the Government. The State of Maryland sought to impose a tax upon the notes of a United States bank in Maryland. The notes were property just as a railroad is property, and yet the court held that the State of Maryland could not in the exercise of its taxing power tax those notes. It is true that in that case Chief Justice Marshall held that so far as the bank building was concerned the exemption would not apply, but he so held upon the ground that the ownership of the bank building was not essential to the operation of the bank; the bank could be conducted upon leased property, and therefore the bank building could not be regarded as a national instrumentality for the purpose of carrying out the powers conferred by the National Government upon the bank, but all property absolutely essential to the powers conferred upon the bank, such as promissory notes, bills of exchange, etc., were exempt from State taxation.

It should be noted that a railroad is a very different property from a bank building. The ownership of a bank building is not essential to the operation of a banking corporation. The ownership of a railroad is absolutely essential to the operation of a railroad corporation. If Congress, therefore, under the interstate-commerce power, authorizes the construction of a railroad, it makes that railroad the instrumentality for the purpose of carrying out its power—the means of the exercise of the power itself. The operation of the railroad can not be segregated from the right of way, the track, the station buildings, and the general equipment of the road. If they belonged to the Government they would be exempt from State taxation, and if the Government selects as its agent a corporation of its own creation and makes its property the instrumentality for the exercise of governmental powers, and unmistakably shows its intention that this instrumentality shall not be embarrassed by State taxation, clearly the property selected as the instrumentality must be as free from taxation as the powers themselves.

In this connection it is proper to say that my contention as to the right of the United States to exempt a railroad incorporated under a national law for interstate commerce, from State taxation is not urged for the purpose of freeing such roads from sharing the burden of government, but simply for the purpose of securing a uniform rule of taxation by the States, with a view to facilitating the public regulation of railroad corporations in which the fixed charge of taxes is an important consideration.

Under the rule laid down in Van Allen v. The Assessors (3 Wall., 573), it would be competent for the Congress of the United States to submit the property of national railroads engaged in interstate commerce to State taxation, first prescribing the rule by which such property should be taxed. In this way Congress could secure uniformity and certainty in the taxes.

THE AUTHORITIES.

In Luxton v. North River Bridge Company (153 U. S., 525), it was held that, under the power to regulate commerce among the States, Congress may create a corporation to build a bridge across navigable water between two States, and to take private land for that purpose, making just compensation. And Mr. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> The Congress of the United States, being empowered by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several States, and pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of the powers specifically conferred, may make use of any appropriate means for this end. As said by Chief Justice Marshall, "The power of creating a corporation, though appertaining to sovereignty, is not, like the power of making war, or levying taxes, or of regulating commerce, a great substantive and independent power which can not be implied as incidental to other powers or used as a means of executing them. It is never the end for which other powers are exercised, but a means by which other objects are accomplished." Congress, therefore, may create corporations as appropriate means of executing the powers of government, as, for instance, a bank for the purpose of carrying on the fiscal operations of the United States, or a railroad corporation for the purpose of promoting commerce among the States. (McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, 411, 422; Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat., 738, 861–873; Pacific R. R. Removal Cases, 115 U. S., 1, 18; California v. Pacific R. R., 127 U. S., 1, 39.) Congress has likewise the power, exercised early in this country by successive acts in the case of the Cumberland or National road from the Potomac across the Alleghenies, to the Ohio, to authorize the construction of a public highway connecting several States. See Indiana v. United States, 148 U. S., 148. (153 U. S., 529.)

In California v. Pacific Railroad (127 U. S., 1) it was directly adjudged that Congress has authority, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce among the several States, to authorize corporations to construct railroads across the States, as well as the Territories of the United States; and Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, and referring to the acts of Congress establishing corporations to build railroads across the continent, said:

It can not at the present day be doubted that Congress, under the power to regulate commerce among the several States, as well as to provide for postal accommodations and military exigencies, had authority to pass these laws. The power to construct, or to authorize individuals or corporations to construct, national highways and bridges from State to State is essential to the complete control and regulation of interstate commerce. Without authority in Congress to establish and maintain such highways and bridges it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of Congress. This power in former times was exerted to a very limited extent, the Cumberland, or National, road being the most notable instance. Its exertion was but little called for, as commerce was mostly then conducted by water, and many of our statesmen entertained doubts as to the existence of the power to establish ways of communication by land. But since, in consequence of the expansion of the country, the multiplication of its products, and the inventions of railroads and locomotion by steam, land transportation has so vastly increased, a sounder consideration of the subject has prevailed and led to the conclusion that Congress has plenary power over the whole subject. Of course the authority of Congress over the Territories of the United States and its power to grant franchises exercisable therein are, and ever have been, undoubted. But the wider power was very freely exercised, and much to the general satisfaction, in the creation of the vast system of railroads connecting the East with the Pacific, traversing States as well as Territories, and employing the agency of the State as well as Federal corporations. (127 U. S., 39–40.)

McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 485).—This case decided that a stamp tax on the notes issued by a Federal bank was a tax on the operation of a Federal agency and therefore void. The essence of the decision is the impotency of the States to burden the operations of the Federal Government.

As to a tax on property as distinguished from operations, the court said, in conclusion:

The States have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or in any manner control the operations of the constitutional laws enacted by Congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the General Government. * * *

This opinion * * * does not extend to a tax paid by the real property of the bank, in common with the other real property within the State, nor to a tax imposed on the interest which the citizens of Maryland may hold in this institution, in common with other property of the same description throughout the State.

Thompson v. Pacific Railroad (9 Wall., 579).—This was a case of taxation by a State of a railroad acting under a Federal charter, as well as a State charter. The court said (p. 590):

We do not think ourselves warranted, therefore, in extending the exemption established by the case of McCulloch v. Maryland beyond its terms. We can not apply it to the case of a corporation deriving its existence from State law, exercising its franchise under State law, and holding its property within State jurisdiction and under State protection.

In this case the court considered the possibility of what would happen if Congress should do what it had not done, to wit, explicitly exempt its agent from taxation. The court said (p. 588):

We do not doubt, however, that * * * Congress may * * * exempt, in its discretion, the agencies employed in such service from any State taxation which will really prevent or impede the performance of them.

But can the right of this road to exemption from such taxation be maintained in the absence of any legislation by Congress to that effect?

Throughout this case it will be noted that the court is careful to say that the case did not present the feature of any positive attempt on the part of Congress to exempt the property from State taxation, and the inference is clear that in such a case the exemption would have been operative and the State tax invalid.

The case emphasizes the difference between property and the operations of an agent of the Government, as follows (p. 591):

We fully recognize the soundness of the doctrine that no State has a "right to tax the means employed by the Government of the Union for the execution of its powers." But we think there is a clear distinction between the means employed by the Government and the property of agents employed by the Government. Taxation of the agency is taxation of the means; taxation of the property of the agent is not always, or generally, taxation of the means.

No one questions that the power to tax all property, business, and persons, within their respective limits, is original in the States and has never been surrendered. It can not be so used, indeed, as to defeat or hinder the operations of the National Government; but it will be safe to conclude, in general, in reference to persons and State corporations employed in Government service, that when Congress has not interposed to protect their property from State taxation, such taxation is not obnoxious to that objection.

Again obviously intimating a different opinion had Congress expressly established such exemption.

Railroad Company v. Peniston (18 Wallace, 5).—The case arose out of the claim on the part of the State of Nebraska of the power to tax roadbed, depots, wood stations, water stations, and other realty, telegraph poles, telegraph wires, bridges, boats, papers, office furniture and fixtures, money and credits, movable property, engines, etc., of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

The company was created by the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes." Various amendments were made to the original act at later sessions of Congress, but neither in the original act nor in any amendment was any provision made by Congress respecting the taxation of it or its property by the States through which the road might run.

The tax was resisted by the company on the ground that, having been incorporated by Congress—

The State of Nebraska has no power to subject to taxation for State purposes the roadbed, rolling stock, and other property necessary for the use and operation of the road, such power resting exclusively in the Government of the United States.

It was distinctly stated by Mr. Chief Justice Strong, who delivered the opinion, that—

The States may not levy taxes the direct effect of which shall be to hinder the exercise of any powers which belong to the National Government. The Constitution contemplates that none of those powers may be restrained by State legislation (p. 30).

After referring to the legislation creating the Union Pacific road and adverting to the objects and purposes of that legislation, the justice further said (p. 32):

Admitting, then, fully, as we do, that the company is an agent of the General Government, designed to be employed, and actually employed, in the legitimate service of the Government, both military and postal, does it necessarily follow that its property is exempt from State taxation?

Emphasizing the difference between the operations of an agent and the property thereof, Justice Strong said (p. 33):

It may therefore be considered as settled that no constitutional implications prohibit a State tax upon the property of an agent of the Government merely because it is the property of such an agent.

Then, after consideration of the various cases bearing upon the general question, Justice Strong summed up as follows (p. 36–37):

It is therefore manifest that exemption of Federal agencies from State taxation is dependent, not upon the nature of the agents, or upon the mode of their constitution, or upon the fact that they are agents, but upon the effect of the tax; that is, upon the question whether the tax does in truth deprive them of power to serve the Government as they were intended to serve it, or does hinder the efficient exercise of their power. A tax upon their property has no such necessary effect. It leaves them free to discharge the duties they have undertaken to perform. A tax upon their operations is a direct obstruction to the exercise of Federal powers.

Eight justices heard this case, and the opinion of the court upholding the validity of the tax was concurred in by four of them. A fifth, Justice Swayne, concurred in the judgment, but said:

I see no reason to doubt that it was the intention of Congress not to give the exemption claimed. The exercise of the power may be waived, but I hold that the road is a national instrumentality of such a character that Congress may interpose and protect it from State taxation whenever that body shall deem it proper to do so.

So that Justice Swayne would have decided against the majority of the court had there been exempting legislation. Two other justices flatly dissented, giving an opinion to the effect that such State taxation was invalid, even in the silence of Congress. And the eighth justice merely remarked: "I dissent from the opinion of the court."

Thus all that can be claimed from this decision as to the power of Congress to exempt a corporation from taxation by affirmative legislation is that the court was evenly divided, and even this can not be fairly claimed, for the case of exempting legislation was not before the court, and the opinions of the four justices who upheld the tax do not contain a word which denies the power of Congress to exempt the property which it expressly declares to be its chosen instrumentality.

Mr. Justice Bradley, for himself and Mr. Justice Field, delivered a vigorous dissenting opinion, in the course of which he said (p. 47):

The Union Pacific Railroad Company, therefore, being a United States corporation created for national objects and purposes, and deriving its existence, its powers, its duties, its liabilities from the United States alone; being responsible to the United States, now as formerly, for a whole congeries of duties and observances; being subjected to the forfeiture of its corporate franchises, powers, and property to the United States and not to any individual State; being charged with important duties connected with the very functions of the Government, every consideration adduced in the cases of McCulloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. The Bank, would seem to require that it should be exempt not only from State taxation, but from State control and interference, except so far as relates to the preservation of the peace and the performance of its obligations and contracts. In reference to these and to the ordinary police regulations imposed for sanitary purposes and the preservation of good order, of course, it is amenable to State and local laws.

As an instrument of national commerce as well as Government operations, it has been regulated by Congress. Can it be further regulated by State legislation? Can the State alter its route, its gauge, its connections, its fares, its franchises, or any part of its charter? Can the State step in between it and the superior power or sovereignty to which is responsible? Such an hypothesis, it seems to me, is inadmissible and repugnant to the necessary relations arising and existing in the case. Such an hypothesis would greatly derogate from and render almost useless and ineffective that hitherto unexecuted power of Congress to regulate commerce by land among the several States. If it be declared in advance that no agency of such commerce, which Congress may hereafter establish, can be freed from local impositions, taxation, and tolls, the hopes of future free and unrestricted intercourse between all parts of this great country will be greatly discouraged and repressed.

Again:

But it is contended that the laying of a tax on the roadbed of the company is nothing more than laying a tax on ordinary real estate, which was conceded might be done in the case of the United States Bank in reference to its banking house or other lands taken for claims due in the course of its business. This is a plausible suggestion, but, in my apprehension, not a sound one. In ascertaining what is essential in every case, respect must always be had to the subject-matter. The State of Maryland undertook to tax the circulation of the United States branch bank established in that State by requiring stamps to be affixed thereto; the State of Ohio imposed a general tax of $50,000 upon the branch established therein. These taxes were declared unconstitutional and void. They impeded the operations of the bank as a financial agent. Real estate was not a necessary appurtenant to the exercise of the functions of the bank. It might hire rooms for its office, or it might purchase or erect a building.

But the primary object of a railroad company is commerce and transportation. In its case a railroad track is just as essential to its operations as the use of a currency or the issue or purchase of bills of exchange is to the operations of a bank. To tax the road is to tax the very instrumentality which Congress desired to establish, and to operate which it created the corporation.

Besides, all that a railroad company possesses in reference to its roadbed is the right of way and the right to use that land for the purpose of way. This is a franchise conferred by the Government, and inseparately connected with the other franchises which enable it to perform the duties for the performance of which it was created. Any estate in the land—the soil, the underlying earth—beyond this belongs to the original proprietor, and that proprietor in the present case is the Government itself. So that, look at it what way we will, there is no room for the taxing power of the State. The estate in the soil can not be taxed, for that remains in the United States; the franchise of right of way and materials of track can not be taxed, because they are essentially connected with and form a part of the powers, faculties, and capital by which the national purposes of the organization are accomplished.

If the roadbed may be taxed, it may be seized and sold for nonpayment of taxes—seized and sold in parts and parcels, separated by county or State lines—and thus the whole purpose of Congress in creating the corporation and establishing the line may be subverted and destroyed.

In my judgment, the tax laid in this case was an unconstitutional interference with the instrumentalities created by the National Government in carrying out the objects and powers conferred upon it by the Constitution (pp. 49–50).

In Van Brocklin v. State of Tennessee (117 U. S., 151), Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the court said:

The liability of the property of the Pacific railroad companies to State taxation has been upheld on the distinction * * * that, although the railroad corporations were agents of the United States, the property taxed was not the property of the United States, and a State might tax the property of the agents, provided it did not tax the means employed by the National Government.

And he there quoted with approval the following from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in the Peniston case:

The States can not tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, nor the means which it employs to carry its powers into execution.

In California v. Central Pacific Railroad Company (127 U. S., 1) the question of taxation by the State of California of the franchise of the Central Pacific Railroad Company came before the Supreme Court in this case, and the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Bradley, unanimously held that such franchise was not subject to taxation by the State. In the opinion the following language is used:

It seems very clear that the State of California can neither take them (the franchises held by the company) away, nor destroy nor abridge them, nor cripple them by onerous burdens. Can it tax them? It may undoubtedly tax outside visible property of the company situated within the State. That is a different thing. But may it tax the franchises which are the grant of the United States? In our judgment it can not. What is a franchise? * * *

Generalized, and divested of the special form which it assumes under a monarchical government based on feudal traditions, a franchise is a right, privilege, or power of public concern, which ought not to be exercised by private individuals at their mere will and pleasure, but should be reserved for public control and administration, either by the government directly or by public agents, acting under such conditions and regulations as the government may impose in the public interest and for the public security. Such rights and powers must exist under every form of society. They are always educed by the laws and customs of the community. Under our system their existence and disposal are under the control of the legislative department of the government, and they can not be assumed or exercised without legislative authority. No private person can establish a public highway, or a public ferry, or a railroad, or charge tolls for the use of the same, without authority from the legislature, direct or derived. These are franchises. * * * No persons can make themselves a body corporate and politic without legislative authority. Corporate capacity is a franchise. * * *

In view of this description of the nature of a franchise, how can it be possible that a franchise granted by Congress can be subject to taxation by a State without the consent of Congress? Taxation is a burden, and may be laid so heavily as to destroy the thing taxed, or render it valueless. As Chief Justice Marshall said in McCulloch v. Maryland, "the power to tax involves the power to destroy." Recollecting the fundamental principle that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are the supreme law of the land, it seems to us almost absurd to contend that a power given to a person or corporation by the United States may be subjected to taxation by a State. The power conferred emanates from, and is a portion of, the power of the government that confers it. To tax it is not only derogatory to the dignity, but subversive of the powers of the government and repugnant to its paramount sovereignty. * * * It may be added that these views are not in conflict with the decisions of this court in Thomson v. Pacific Railroad (9 Wall., 579), and Railroad Company v. Peniston (18 Wall., 5). As explained in the opinion of the court in the latter case, the tax there was upon the property of the company and not upon its franchises or operations. (127 U. S., 40–41.)

Reagan v. Mercantile Trust Company (154 U. S., 413).—While the language in this case is not wholly clear, it seems to indicate a belief that Congress might exempt such a railroad from State taxation. Page 416:

Similarly we think it may be said that, conceding to Congress the power to remove the corporation in all its operations from the control of the State, there is in the act creating this company nothing which indicates an intent on the part of Congress to so remove it. * * * It (Congress) must have known that, in the nature of things, the control of that business would be exercised by the State, and if it deemed that the interests of the nation and the discharge of the duties required on behalf of the nation from this corporation demanded exemption in all things from State control it would unquestionably have expressed such intention in language whose meaning would be clear. Its silence in this respect is satisfactory assurance that, in so far as this corporation should engage in business wholly within the State, it intended that it should be subjected to the ordinary control exercised by the State over such business.

In Central Pacific Railroad Company v. California (162 U. S., 125) the court said:

It may be regarded as firmly settled that although corporations may be agents of the United States their property is not the property of the United States, but the property of the agents, and that a State may tax the property of the agents, subject to the limitations pointed out in Railroad Company v. Peniston, etc.

Of course, if Congress should think it necessary for the protection of the United States to declare such property exempted, that would present a different question.

Van Allen v. The Assessors (3 Wall., 70 U. S., p. 573).—The court in this case considered the act of June 3, 1864, "to provide a national currency," etc., which subjected the shares of bank associations in the hands of shareholders to taxation by the States under certain limitations. It also considered the act of March 9, 1865, of the legislature of New York, which taxed such shares but did not tax them by the same rule as the shares of State banks, and held this statute unwarranted by the act of Congress and void. The court said (p. 591):

That Congress may constitutionally organize or constitute agencies for carrying into effect the national powers granted by the Constitution; that those agencies may be organized by the voluntary association of individuals, sanctioned by Congress; that Congress may give to such agencies so organized corporate unity, permanence, and efficiency; and that such agencies in their being, capital, franchises, and operations are not subject to the taxing power of the States, have ever been regarded since those decisions as settled doctrines of this court.

It will be perceived in this case that Congress laid down the rule under which a State tax could be levied upon the capital invested in a national incorporation, and, as the rule laid down by Congress was violated by the State, the tax of the State was held to be invalid.

From the foregoing authorities it seems clear—

First. That Congress, under the power to regulate interstate commerce, can create corporations for the purpose of engaging in such commerce.

Second. That a State can not tax the franchises of such corporations, nor can it interfere with the operations of a corporation chartered by the United States for such purposes, or hinder, impede, or burden such corporations in carrying out such purposes.

Third. That, while the State may tax the tangible property of the corporation within its territorial limits, in the absence of any restriction upon the taxing power of the State contained in the charter of the corporation, nevertheless Congress may, in terms, expressly provide against such State taxation by a declaration that all the property of the corporation necessary for the carrying out of the purposes for which it was incorporated shall not be subject to State taxation, or it can prescribe the rule for State taxation. In other words, Congress itself can declare what shall be regarded as the instrumentalities of government, can define such instrumentalities in the charter itself, and upon such instrumentalities the States can not levy any tax if Congress forbids.

TAXATION ACCORDING TO DENSITY OF TRAFFIC.

In laying down such a rule it may be said that sufficient regard would not be had to the density of traffic; that in some States traffic would be very much more dense than in others; that it would be very unfair to allow to States in which the traffic is less dense the same tax per mile as to States in which the traffic is greater. This objection can be met by providing that each mile of second track should be estimated as one-half mile of main track, and that each mile of third, fourth, or fifth track should be estimated as a quarter mile of main track, and thus the States whose density of traffic is demonstrated by the existence of second, third, and fourth tracks would receive a larger amount proportionately per mile of main track than the States in which the traffic is not so dense and in which such extra trackage does not exist.

A CERTAIN FACTOR IN RATE FIXING.

The advantage of this method of taxation would be also that the Interstate Commerce Commission would have another factor in their determination of rates which would be entirely certain. As it is, assuming that these railroads are entitled to a fair return upon a fair valuation, that return can only be ascertained after computing the gross receipts, then deducting from such receipts the expenses of operation and maintenance, and finally deducting the taxes and fixed charges. The balance would be the income which would be applied as a return upon the value of the property.

It is, therefore, of the highest importance that the taxes themselves should be fixed and certain. If they vary, the whole calculation of the Interstate Commerce Commission must vary, for the rates must be adjusted in such a way as to yield to the corporation operating expenses, maintenance, and taxes, and a fair return upon the valuation.

ACCIDENT AND INSURANCE FUND.

A national incorporation act should also provide for an insurance fund. We all know that in every State in the Union the employees of railroads are pushing legislation fixing the liability of corporations for injuries to employees, even though caused by the negligence of fellow employees. There is constant warfare between the railroads and their employees upon this question, and it is another fruitful source of the activity of railroads in politics. In order to protect themselves, they are omnipresent in all the legislatures of the country upon this subject. It seems to me that we should frankly recognize such liability as a charge upon the transportation of the country. There should be a fund created to aid those employees who are disqualified for active service through accident or old age, by providing that the national corporations should pay into the national Treasury 1 per cent of their gross receipts, which, under the present system, would amount to about $20,000,000 annually.

This fund should be invested by the Interstate Commerce Commission in interest-bearing securities, and the Interstate Commerce Commission should frame rules and regulations with regard to its payment to the disqualified employees. This $20,000,000 would not be taken from the profits of the stockholders, but would be imposed upon the commerce of the country as part of the operating expenses of the companies. In this way we would do much to relieve the present hostility between the corporations and their employees regarding this matter, and we would do much to protect the men who are engaged in this public service of an extra hazardous character.

NATIONAL OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

Mr. President, I have already referred to the fact that this bill is likely to burden the Interstate Commerce Commission to such an extent that it will prove inert and inactive and incapable of accomplishing its purpose. If we establish a rule that will work automatically, tending toward a gradual reduction of rates, there will be no difficulty; but if we do not, I believe there will be a steady and increasing tendency toward nationalization of all the railroads of the country.

The proposition is a very simple one. The existing railroads are now, for the most part, embraced in about ten systems, each of them controlled by a corporation organized under the laws of a single State. These corporations have outstanding about $6,000,000,000 of bonds and $6,000,000,000 of stock. It is unnecessary to consider the bonds, for they can remain as a charge upon the property when the United States Government seeks to acquire the railroads, and it can gradually substitute for the existing bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 4, 4½, or 5 per cent bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent, thus making a gradual reduction of about $100,000,000 annually in interest charges. It is not necessary for the Government to condemn the physical property of the corporations. All that it needs is the interest of the shareholders.

This was done recently in the case of the Panama Railroad, when a bill passed the Senate, with the approval, I believe, of all the lawyers, giving the United States power to condemn shares of stock in the Panama Railroad that were outstanding. We could exercise that same power now with our railroads, and all that we would have to provide for would be the market value of all the railroad stocks, whose par value is about $6,000,000,000. Such market value is, I believe, about $5,000,000,000.

NATIONAL OWNERSHIP EASILY FINANCED.

The statement for 1904 shows that the net income of all the railroads of the country, after paying operating expenses, taxes, maintenance, and interest upon debt, amounted to $278,000,000. Assuming that we had to pay $5,000,000,000 for all the stocks outstanding, we could issue national bonds at 3 per cent therefor, and the annual interest charge would not be more than $150,000,000. We would have, according to this statement, an excess of $128,000,000 annually, which could be applied to a sinking fund or to extensions. The nation could also gradually retire the existing mortgage bonds bearing interest at about 4½ per cent with 3 per cent bonds, and thus make a saving in interest of $100,000,000 more, and thus we would in time accomplish an annual saving of $228,000,000, which would construct at least seven or eight thousand miles of railroad annually to keep pace with all the requirements for new construction in the future. Or, if new capital should be applied to that, the $228,000,000 put into a sinking fund would soon retire every dollar of indebtedness created by the purchase of these railroads. Or we could enter upon national ownership in a very limited way.

A NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL LINE.

We could acquire simply one trunk line from the Atlantic to the Pacific by acquiring the Baltimore and Ohio running from New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore to Chicago and the Atchison system running from Chicago to San Diego, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. We could condemn their stock for about $450,000,000, leaving the roads subject to a bond issue of about $500,000,000. The income of those properties would take care of the interest charges and leave a surplus that could be applied to a sinking fund or to new construction. Branch lines of railway could be built from this great central line or the numerous railroads in the country that are not embraced in the great systems could connect and cooperate with it. I suggest this line because less money would be required in financing it than in any other line.

INCREASE IN INCOME.

That the income of these railroads is bound to increase largely under existing conditions is demonstrated by a comparison of their earnings for 1904 and the earnings for 1897. The gross earnings for 1904 were $1,975,000,000; for 1897 (seven years previous), they were $1,122,000,000, an increase in seven years of about 70 per cent. It is altogether probable that within the next ten years the present gross earnings of the railroads now aggregating about $2,000,000,000 will be increased to $4,000,000,000.

A more favorable showing is made regarding the net income. In 1904 after deducting all interest charges, operating expenses, maintenance, and taxes the net income was $278,000,000, while in 1897 it was only $81,000,000. So their net income has been increased within a period of seven years over 300 per cent.

The nation having acquired the stock of these railroads, their operation could be continued under their present managers, with their present employees. The roads could continue to pay their present taxes to the States, so that no readjustment of revenues would be necessary, and the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission could constitute the directors of these corporations and gradually work out a system of national administration, just as the Panama Commissioners are now acting as the directors of the Panama Railroad Company.

If the United States is ever to enter upon the purchase and nationalization of these roads it could never act at a more favorable time than now, nor with more justice to the stockholders and bondholders of these corporations, for their stocks have within seven years increased from 25 to 100 per cent in value.

NATIONAL CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROADS.

But if the United States should be unwilling to condemn existing properties, which, on the average, are capitalized at about $65,000 per mile, it could easily enter upon the work of national construction without interfering seriously with the operations of any of the existing systems. I imagine it would not be our wish to imperil the investments of the stock or bondholders of existing corporations, and that many would not look with favor upon a policy which would put the Government in the attitude of a competitor with private railroads.

But we must remember that new construction is going on at the rate of about 5,000 miles per annum. There is no reason why the United States should not take up new construction—the construction of the future. The railroads are now engaging in it. The Gould system is now being extended into a transcontinental line. It will be absolutely necessary in the near future to duplicate and perhaps triplicate the tracks of some of the existing roads in order to meet the demands of business. Why, then, should not the United States construct one road from ocean to ocean, and operate it as an experiment in national ownership?

Three thousand miles of railroad would not cost more than $35,000 per mile. One hundred million dollars would construct such a railroad. The Geological Survey, with its great force of topographers and civil, railroad, hydraulic, and construction engineers, now employed in the Reclamation Service, could easily undertake the work, and thus the nation would have an opportunity of contrasting Government construction and operation with that of private corporations.

The nation could in this way, while leaving the existing railroads in the enjoyment of their present business, simply take up the railroad construction of the future. The capitalization of such roads would be at the rate of $35,000 a mile, instead of the existing capitalization of about $65,000 a mile.

The financial difficulty therefore is not a great one. If we take hold of all the roads or a chain of roads, like the Baltimore and Ohio and the Atchison system, the net income would pay all the interest charges and leave a surplus for a sinking fund or extensions.

COMPLEXITY OF EXISTING CONDITIONS.

I imagine that the country will respond to such an appeal unless we relieve the complexity of the existing conditions. What is that complexity? We have 2,000 railroad corporations in this country, combined, for the most part, into eight or ten great systems. The complexity of the situation is beyond parallel. It is almost impossible to get at the facts regarding these great systems.

Look over the interstate commerce reports and you will find the Pennsylvania Railroad operating a system. Under its name, as subsidiary lines, will be eighty or ninety different roads, and you will find at the side after the name of each road a note to the effect that this line is a subsidiary line, and that line is an operating line; in this line the Pennsylvania Railroad owns all the stock, in that line the Pennsylvania Railroad owns a part of the stock; this road is leased; with another road it has traffic arrangements, etc. Thus you find the utmost complexity as to title and ownership and the holding of these various systems, all arising out of the fact that, while combination is desirable, the laws, whether national or State, have not provided suitable machinery for its accomplishment.

This complexity is, and will continue to be, a fruitful source of corruption and fraud. Then we find that there is some understanding between the New York Central, the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Norfolk and Western, and the Chesapeake and Ohio, all of them trunk lines, all of them occupying the territory of densest traffic, all of them national in their operations, for they embrace not only the traffic of the States through which they operate, but the traffic of the entire Union. The traffic of the Pacific coast, the traffic of the Southern States, the traffic of the Middle States all go over these trunk lines, and yet it is impossible for a national commission to understand what is the relation of these various roads toward each other.

It finds each of them operating numerous subsidiary companies, all bound to the parent company by the most complicated arrangements. Some of these arrangements take the shape of rentals. How can they tell whether a fair rental is made in these cases? Suppose the directors of the New York Central are interested in a railroad which is intended to be taken into the New York Central system, and they do it through the medium of a nine hundred and ninety-nine year lease, I ask whether they are likely to be very rigid with themselves in fixing the terms of that lease? Whether, if it is a question between a rental that will yield 4 per cent and one that will yield 8 per cent, they will not be likely to determine in favor of the latter, and whether in that case the larger rental will not, by the contract of parties interested upon both sides, dealing with each other, be fastened upon the entire commerce of the country?

INTERCORPORATE HOLDINGS.

Then these railroads have their intercorporate holdings. The Baltimore and Ohio owns $30,000,000 of the stock of the Reading Company, a company which owns the stock of the Philadelphia and Reading Company and also owns extensive coal mines. We have also the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, which is one of the subsidiary roads of the New York Central, owning an equal amount, I believe, about $30,000,000, in the stock of the Reading Company. Then we have the Pennsylvania owning a large amount of Baltimore and Ohio stock, and we find some of the subsidiary roads of the New York Central owning stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio and the Norfolk and Western. So they are all interlinked with each other. These four railroad systems constitute the trunk lines of the country over which almost all the commerce of the country goes, and yet they are organized under the laws of particular States in whose government the people of the nation generally have no share.

I ask whether it is an essential doctrine of State rights that the State of New York is to create the machine that is to do the business for the nation; or that the State of Pennsylvania or the State of New Jersey should create the machine that is to do the nation's business? Would it not be very much wiser to provide for a national incorporation act, under which these great consolidations can be accomplished and under which they can be supervised and controlled. The intercorporate holdings of these railroads to which I have alluded aggregate nearly three billion dollars—nearly two billion in stock and nearly one billion in bonds—and of these intercorporate holdings three hundred millions are holdings in corporations that are not transporting corporations, not railroad companies, but coal companies, steel companies, companies engaged in production.

The States furnish the machinery by which production and transportation can be linked together. I imagine nothing can be more apparent than the fact that if you give certain men control of the transportation of the country and also give them control of the production, through these great trusts and combinations, they will in time absorb all the wealth in the country, and yet this is permitted under State laws, while the Nation, whose commerce is three-fourths of all the commerce in the country, sits idly by and allows the States to frame the charters under which these great masters of transportation and of production can absorb the productive wealth of the country.

ABSORPTION OF STATE RAILROADS BY NATIONAL CORPORATIONS.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is speaking of a condition now existing. We have in this country some 230,000 miles of railway, I believe, almost all of which is the property of companies which have already been chartered by the States——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BACON. And which to-day exist as corporations by State authority. I should like to know of the Senator, if he could secure the necessary consent of Congress to carry out his scheme, in what way could the charters of these hundreds, and almost thousands, of corporations granted by the States be taken away from them—nullified, in other words—and national charters substituted therefor, except by the consent of the States themselves, unless you are going to work a much more far-reaching revolution in the centralization of power than we have ever had suggested by the most extreme advocate of central power? In what way would the Senator proceed practically to consummate the purpose which he now suggests, and that is to bring under Federal control all of these hundreds, if not thousands, of corporations now existing under State law, with corporate rights secured under State laws, and all these vested interests built up under State law? What would be the practical proceeding which the Senator would recommend to enable him to carry out his purpose, even if he had the consent of Congress to do it?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the Senator that in the first place I would not attempt to do it without the consent of the States. But I assume that the States would yield their assent just as readily to the operation of railroads incorporated by the Nation as to the operation of railroads incorporated by sister States.

Mr. BACON. I should like to suggest to the Senator——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Take the Southern States, for instance——

Mr. BACON. I should like to suggest to the Senator the very remarkable difference there is between the two. When a corporation is organized by a sister State it does business in another State simply by the comity of that other State and by the consent of that other State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Whereas, if the scheme the Senator from Nevada suggests could be inaugurated, it would not be a matter of consent on the part of the State. If we have the power to do what he contends for, it would be a matter of obligation and compulsion on the part of the State, whether it desired it or not. That is a very different thing from the State being willing to consent to a railroad operating under a charter granted by some other State, the exercise of whose corporate powers in that State still continue to be within the control of that State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the Senator I have very much modified my proposition since I first asserted it, in order to meet the objections of those who fear that it might involve usurpation of State sovereignty. I have now framed some provisions, which the Senator will find in the appendix to my views upon this bill when reported from the committee, in which I take up the question to which he has referred.

I will state that so far as new construction is concerned, there is no doubt about the power of the National Government to organize national corporations for the purpose of conducting an interstate road. If such a road were constructed, the National Government could lay down the scheme of taxation for that road.

Mr. KEAN. Without the consent of the States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Without the consent of the State; absolutely.

Mr. KEAN. Take land and do everything necessary?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly; under the power of eminent domain.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon the inquiry, as I ask for information simply. The Senator is contending for a system of national taxation to the exclusion of State taxation. Does the Senator mean now to assert the doctrine that under the power of interstate commerce the Federal Government can charter a railroad through a State and deny to the State the right to tax that railroad, and take to itself the exclusive power to tax that railroad?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do. I would not deem it wise, however, to exercise that power.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator did advocate the exercise of that power, because the great evil that I understand him to be combating is the evil which grows out of State taxation. The Senator wishes to have uniform taxation, which, he says, can be accomplished only by the National Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But I would not exercise that power by exempting the property from State taxation. I would exercise it by providing the rule and the method of taxation.

Mr. BACON. By which the State would levy the tax?

Mr. NEWLANDS. By which the State would levy the tax.

Mr. BACON. But that would imply, of course, the power to deny to the State the power to tax it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I contend for that.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has given very much more thought to this subject than I have, and I should like to inquire of him whether his statement that in his opinion it is within the power of the National Government to authorize the construction of railroad through a State and to deny to the State the right to tax any of that property is based simply upon his own reflection or upon the statement or ruling of any court?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Upon both, I will say to the Senator. I claim, in the first place, that the National Government can itself construct a railroad—an interstate railroad. It can, if it chooses, construct a railroad from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, just as to-day it is constructing the Panama Canal. I claim, further, that that road—a Government road—after it is constructed, would be exempt from taxation by the State.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is now speaking of the construction of a railroad by the Government and not of the granting of a franchise to a company.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; but I am going to follow it up.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is now speaking of the appropriation by the Government to its own use of property in the way of right of way, etc., and upon that constructing a railway, the title of which shall be in the Government and the ownership of which shall be in the Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BACON. That would be very limited in its operation, necessarily, if the Senator is speaking of those things which are practical. As I understand the contention of the Senator it is that there is such great evil growing out of the multiplicity of railroads, with different charters, different powers, different burdens resting upon them, of their own indebtedness, and of differing systems of taxation and rates of taxation, that it is of the highest importance that all this vast system shall be unified in such a way that there shall be uniformity of burden upon the railroad companies, in the way of taxation particularly. When the Senator suggests the construction of a road by the Government, of course he has to engraft that upon a system which already has 230,000 miles of railway.

So in dealing with the question practically, for the purpose of meeting the evil which the Senator contends exists, it seems to me the matter to which our attention should be directed is the question how shall this vast system be unified, and not how it would be practicable to build one railroad. While I do not agree with the Senator on his contention in regard to that proposition, I do not think he meets the question, even if the correctness of his proposition were conceded.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the Senator that I was simply giving him the process of reasoning by which I arrived at the conclusion that a railroad incorporated by the national Government as an instrumentality for interstate commerce could be exempted by the National Government from taxation, and so I started by assuming that if the National Government, in the exercise of its power over interstate commerce, should conclude to build a road from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, with all its branches, etc., it could exempt that railroad from State taxation.

Then I assume next that if the National Government, instead of building the railroad itself, concludes to put the construction in charge of an agent, a corporation which it has itself created, it can also stamp that road as a national instrumentality and exempt it by express enactment from State taxation; and that if it can do that, it can prescribe the rule by which the State can tax that particular property. My reasoning thus far extends only to the case of a Government-owned railroad or a Government-incorporated railroad. Now let us take up——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to get through with my reply to the Senator from Georgia.

CAN CONGRESS RELIEVE THE RAILROADS FROM STATE TAXATION?

Mr. HEYBURN. Before the Senator leaves that question I should like to ask whether, in his judgment, it is competent for Congress to relieve this property from taxation in the States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator: In some counties in my State the railroads pay from sixty to seventy per cent of the taxes that go to the maintenance of the local government. I suppose there are such instances in Nevada. Would the Senator regard as reasonable any law which would exempt those railroads from contributing to the expenses of the government that affords them protection?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would not, and I do not propose to exempt them.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think there are counties in the Senator's State where the railroads pay as much as 80 per cent of the expense of maintaining local government. If you are going to exempt the railroads from taxation within the States, where is the substitute to be found for maintaining the local government—schools, roads, etc.?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say to the Senator that I do not propose to exempt the railroads from State taxation. On the contrary, I propose to subject them to State taxation.

Mr. HEYBURN. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I propose that the National Government shall fix the rule by which the roads shall be taxed, providing they are railroads under national incorporation, created as national instrumentalities for the purpose of carrying out a national power.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks Congress can do that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Can project a railroad into a State, which railroad enjoys the protection of State laws, and the State be able to tax the railroad only under the rule established by the Government, without any State control over it at all?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not propose that the National Government shall tax the railroads at all, but that the National Government shall fix the rule by which the States shall tax them.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is the difference between fixing the rule under which the railroads shall be taxed and taxing them, because if the Government could fix the rule it could limit it without regard to the necessities of the State? It seems to me a difficulty would arise there.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So far as the power is concerned—we have that already illustrated in the action of the National Government with reference to national banks. The National Government fixes the rule by which national banks shall be taxed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that is in the nature of tangible property——

Mr. NEWLANDS. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the other is a class of property that taxes possession of the soil, occupies a part of the territory.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The National Government fixes the rule by which the capital stock of national banks may be taxed in the States.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is tangible property.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is true it does not relieve the real estate of the banks from taxation, but it does fix the rule that shall apply to the capital stock of the bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not to the building.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It does so upon the ground that the national bank is a national instrumentality, and that the State will not be permitted to put a burden upon that national instrumentality which may destroy it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would ask the Senator——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, in this case the national instrumentality is the road itself—the rails and the equipment and the appurtenances—that is, the property, the instrumentality by which transportation is conducted and through which interstate commerce is conducted, and the reasoning, therefore, applies to that instrumentality.

M'CULLOCH v. MARYLAND.

In the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, with which the Senator is familiar, the Supreme Court held that the State of Maryland could not tax the notes of a national bank, and it held it could not upon the ground that the bank was a national instrumentality, and the sovereignty of the Nation could not permit the sovereignty of the State to put a burden upon a national instrumentality which might destroy it. It is true that in that case the court said that the exemption would not apply to the real property upon which the bank was located.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was going to ask that question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But recollect in that case the property of the bank was not exempted by statute at all—none of it—and the Supreme Court held in that case that by implication the property to which I have referred was exempt from taxation because it was necessary in the exercise of the powers of the National Government. The ownership of the bank building is not. They could conduct their bank in a leased building But, so far as all of the instrumentalities necessary to exercise the power, they are exempt.

In this particular case the railroad is the thing. It is the instrumentality itself—the railroad, its appurtenances, and its equipment—and I urge that if that railroad is in the ownership of the Government the Government can exempt it from taxation, and if it is in the ownership of a corporation created by the Government, it can exempt it. I admit, as to the law of the case, that that matter has not been finally determined by the Supreme Court, but I have already shown that in the Peniston case the court stood four to four upon it, and the only reason why the judgment was rendered against the exemption in that case was that one of the four judges, who held that the power to exempt could apply to the railroad, claimed that the exemption had not been declared in the statute and that unless it was declared in the statute, it was clearly not the intention of Congress that the property should be exempt. So the case stands four to four in that decision.

But upon the reasoning of the case, the logic of the case, if a national railroad, incorporated by the United States Government, was constructed by an agent of the United States Government, and if it is declared to be a national instrumentality, and declared by the national Government to be exempt from taxation, then under the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, and by reasoning and analogy, it is clear the exemption will be sustained.

As to the policy of exempting it, that is another thing. All I insist upon is a fair rule of taxation. I do not propose to diminish the existing taxes an iota, but I want to propose a rule which will make these taxes mathematically precise, in order in the future to keep the railroads out of politics upon this question, and to aid in the determination of rates by securing a definite factor in the calculation of fixed charges.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in his judgment, if the railroad was the property of the United States, it could be taxed at all by a State? And I will say, in connection with that question, that the strongest argument against Government ownership of railroads is that the States could not tax the property of the Government of the United States, and would therefore be deprived of the support that they naturally should have in the way of taxation.

MERGER.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I know that is urged as a reason. In reply to the Senator from Georgia, who asked me how we would, under a national incorporation act, secure the merger of these State corporations into a national corporation, I will say, in the first place, that I do not propose in my bill that that shall be done without the consent of the States. But if the Senator will look at the legislation of some of the States, particularly the Southern States, he will find that the States have not been loath to allow a foreign corporation to enter their borders and to construct and operate railways. Take the ten Southern States south of Pennsylvania and of Ohio.

Almost the whole of the transportation facilities of those States to-day are under the control of two great systems. One is the Southern Railway system and the other the Atlantic Coast system. Each of these systems operates about 10,000 miles. The Southern Railway Company is incorporated under the laws of Virginia. The Atlantic Coast Railroad Company was originally incorporated under the laws of Virginia, I believe, but its stock has now passed into the hands of the Atlantic Coast Company, which is incorporated under the laws of Connecticut. So we find that one of the systems of railway traversing the entire South is incorporated under the laws of Virginia and the other practically incorporated under the laws of Connecticut.

How is it that those railroad companies operate in those States? With the consent of the States, expressed in legislation. And the Senator will find that in one or more of the States in the South they have laws now upon the statute books which permit merger with any connecting railroad, whether incorporated under the laws of another State or under the laws of the United States. I imagine they will have no more objection to merger with a corporation organized under the laws of the United States than they will have to a merger with a corporation organized under the laws of a State.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Particularly if, as in this case, the law incorporating the national corporation absolutely disclaims any intention of interfering with the police power of the State and provides that it shall only acquire an existing railroad in any State with the consent of that State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Georgia?

DUAL SOVEREIGNTY.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will just let me close this thought. Here are two sovereigns, one the great national sovereign, exercising sovereignty under the granted powers over the territory occupied by all the States of the Union, the other sovereign each of the 45 different States. The State has control over State commerce. The nation has control over interstate commerce. The same machine must do the business of both. Now, if the State can create the machine that is to do interstate commerce the nation can create the machine that is to do State commerce.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, the States can not authorize corporations to do interstate commerce without the approval of the nation, and the nation can not authorize corporations to do State commerce without the approval of the States; but I imagine that consent would be forthcoming in both instances. Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The reason why I sought to interrupt the Senator was because he was passing away from the point on which I wished to reply to him. I want to say, however, that I have no disposition to unduly interrupt the Senator, and my only purpose in the first interruption was to get his views as to how he proposes practically to accomplish that which he argues so effectively theoretically.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

RAILROAD SYSTEMS IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. BACON. The Senator, though, in speaking of the question of probably securing the consent of the States mentions the fact that in the Southern States, using them as an illustration, most of the railroads are owned by two or three systems, and that being operated successfully in States making no special objection to that fact they would equally consent that there should be systems operated under Federal charter, the systems now being operated there having as they do charters of other States.

I wish to make a statement to the Senator, and I do not propose to pursue the discussion further or to interrupt him in the regular course of his remarks. There is a vast difference between the two. The purpose of the Senator, if accomplished by Federal incorporation, would be entirely different in its operation from that which is now accomplished by railroads operated as they are under charters from other States.

The purpose of the Senator is to take away from the States the right to assess and collect taxes, and if his scheme could be carried out under national incorporation the large systems of railroads operated under Federal charters would have as their chief characteristic or feature the fact that their taxes were assessed and perhaps levied by the Federal Government; if not levied certainly assessed. In other words, the State would entirely lose the right of assessing taxes and be remitted under the Senator's scheme purely to the work of collection, whereas as it now exists, while it is true that the railroads are chartered in a large measure (it is not altogether so in my State by any means) by States other than those through which they run, nevertheless in all those cases and in all those States the power of assessing and levying taxes is as perfectly preserved by the State as if the road was chartered within that State and operated solely by an authority or franchise received from it.

As I said, I do not desire to break up the Senator's speech with a colloquy, but I really interrupted him for the purpose of getting his view, if the Senator's theory is a correct theory, and if Congress could be gotten to consent to it and to attempt to put it in execution, in what way would the Senator seek to bring under this general control the 230,000 miles of railroad now being held under charters granted by States and not by the Federal Government. The Senator has already expressed his view as to how that was to be done, and I simply repeat it for the purpose of disclaiming any purpose to enter into any general discussion with him on the subject.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am glad to have the Senator put me any inquiry that he sees fit, and I am only too glad to answer.

I will state to the Senator that it is not absolutely essential that a national incorporation act should provide for a scheme of taxation. I assume that Congress could not, in framing a national incorporation act, provide a scheme of taxation unless it presented obvious advantages—advantages which the representatives of every State in the Union would see.

ADVANTAGES OF UNIFORM TAXATION.

Now, those advantages are that if we have a fixed tax, mathematically ascertained, it will yield as much and more than the States now get. It also takes the railroads out of politics as to taxation, and I regard that as very desirable. Second, it results in a certain factor for the regulating of commerce, both national and State, because then taxes can be definitely and mathematically ascertained as one of the fixed charges of the company, whereas if they are left in the elastic form to which I have already alluded, ranging possibly all the way from the present tax of $56,000,000 in the aggregate to $150,000,000, and involving possibly in addition a tax of equal amount upon the stockholders and bondholders all certainty regarding taxes as a factor in the regulation of railroad rates will be lost.

I would expect, of course, in the consideration of such legislation that the members from the different States represented in Congress would not permit any provision to go in, regarding taxation, unless they felt it was a beneficial provision—beneficial to the States themselves and beneficial to the entire nation. It is not essential, however, to national incorporation, in fact, it is rather extraneous to it. The main purpose to be accomplished by national incorporation is the control over capital, and also the control over the return upon capital.

COMITY OF THE STATES TO THE NATION.

The Senator seems to doubt that the States would pursue the same rule of comity toward a national corporation that they follow with reference to a corporation organized under the laws of a sister State. I admit that at the start there may be a feeling that here is the great national sovereign proposing to dominate the transportation in a particular State. But then I would expect the people of the State and their representatives to reflect upon the utter inadequacy of existing State law to shape a machine that can do this work properly.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me there, I will try not to interrupt him again.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I understand that while it would be the Senator's plan to secure the voluntary action and consent of the State, nevertheless he does contend that in the absence of such consent it would be within the power of the Federal Government without that consent to convert all these charters into Federal charters.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No, I do not contend that.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator recognize that of all the schemes—and I use the word "scheme" not in any disparaging sense—of all the plans that have been suggested, short possibly of the Government ownership of the 230,000 miles of railroad in this country, there has never been a scheme which would so certainly result in the far-reaching and fast-binding of the centralizing power and authority of the general Government as would this scheme.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think not. I do not think it would centralize power in the National Government any more than the present system centralizes power in the hands of outside States. We must locate power somewhere, and under the existing system of combination and consolidation the great corporation which controls the transportation of ten or fifteen States, and through them the commerce of all the Union passing over those roads, is centralized in a particular State, like the State of Virginia, or the State of New Jersey, or the State of New York. I imagine that if this transportation system is to be under the control of a foreign corporation, the States affected would rather have the control in the Federal Government, in whose legislation every State has a share, than in a State in which the people of no other State have any share.

In examining the statutes of some of the States I find they expressly provide for the merger of railroads organized under the laws of that State with railroads organized under the laws of other States, or of the United States. So there is the evidence right upon the statute books that there is no objection to accepting the National Government as the creator of the corporation that is to merge these great systems. Let me call the Senator's attention to the loose legislation that has prevailed in States upon this matter.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, before he goes on to that, just as a mere suggestion, I will revert to the fact that not only the State's control over the railroads thus merged, of which he speaks, is in the right of assessing and collecting taxes, but the right to control in every particular—every matter of police, every matter of taxation, every matter of the regulation of rates is still within the power of the State. Under the Senator's system the matter of police and the matter of regulation and the matter of the regulation of rates would be surrendered to the General Government, as well as the matter of assessing taxes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me read to the Senator the section which I have prepared upon that subject. It is headed:

STATE POLICE AND STATE RATES.

SEC. 18. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as interfering with the police laws of any State regarding railroads incorporated under this act and operating in such States, nor shall anything herein contained be construed as affecting the right and power of each State to regulate purely State commerce on railroads organized under this act. But the Interstate Commerce Commission may hold conferences from time to time with the regulating power of any State with a view to such harmonious adjustment and regulation of State commerce and interstate commerce as will protect the public against abuses or extortion, and the railroads against inadequate returns upon their investment, and promote the efficiency of such corporations as common carriers.

Mr. BACON. The Senator must necessarily recognize the fact that the success of his scheme would involve the permanent surrender by the States thereafter to control any of those matters, and while we might pass that statute now, another statute might be passed to-morrow and the right to regulate the rates in a State, even as to the matter of rate or any question of liability for damages of any kind or under a contract of any kind or any other matter of police, taxation, or the regulation of rates, would be forever gone from the State and thereafter permanently vested solely in the United States.

If the Senator thinks that the States would voluntarily for all time surrender such rights as those, the Senator is very much more sanguine than most of us would possibly be under such circumstances. I think that so far from being ready to surrender for all time such rights as those it would create somewhat of a spirit of resistance, if there was an attempt to force it upon them. The Senator, I understand, of course, does not contemplate that, but I simply speak of it as a matter of contrast.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that no surrender whatever of the rights of any State is involved, in my judgment, in this proposed act. The States have absolute control over purely State commerce. The Federal Government has absolute control over interstate commerce. The same instrumentality is used for both State commerce and interstate commerce.

Now, the only question is, which sovereignty shall create that instrument? After the instrument is created nothing will interfere with the powers of the State over State commerce or with the power of the National Government over interstate commerce. The Senator might as well insist that if we permit the instrument that is to do the interstate commerce we thereby absolutely surrender to the State all power over interstate commerce. The Senator will not contend that.

On the contrary, although Congress has permitted the State to create the instrument of interstate commerce, we are regulating that instrument by all the statutes which we have upon that subject. We have regulated the State instrument as to safety appliances, as to rebates and preferences, and we propose now to regulate it as to rates, but only in relation to interstate commerce. So also, if a national corporation were created, that corporation, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, would be subject to the laws of each particular State; and in the absence of any provision exempting the corporation from taxation, or prescribing the rule for taxation, it would be subject to the laws of that State with reference to taxation.

Now, the Senator seems to view with apprehension the possibility that hereafter we might seek to change this law, but recollect this law can only be changed by the Representatives in this body and in the House of Representatives of the various States affected. Everyone of them has a voice here and a voice in the House of Representatives, and I suggest to the Senator whether it is not better, if the instrument is to be created that is to conduct both State and interstate commerce to have that instrument created by a sovereign in whose action the people of every State can participate rather than in the sovereignty represented by a single State like the State of Virginia, or New York, in which the people of outside States have no representation or voice whatever.

THE INCORPORATION OF THE SOUTHERN SYSTEMS.

Let us see what this present system fastens upon the entire nation as a whole and upon States whose transportation is conducted by corporations organized outside of that State. The two lines to which I have referred—the Atlantic Coast line and the Southern Railway line—each control about 10,000 miles of railways in the South. Each of those lines is composed of many different roads, organized under State laws, and each one of those was probably the result of antecedent consolidations, so that probably each of the present systems represents an aggregate of two or three hundred corporations.

Now, let us look at the law which provided for this. The Southern Railway Company is the successor of the Richmond and Danville. The Richmond and Danville road was a small railroad company operating about 300 miles of railroad in Virginia. It got into difficulty and went into the hands of a receiver. It was purchased by certain parties, and they evidently determined to make it the nucleus of a great national system, for that is what the Southern Railway system is to-day. they applied to the Virginia legislature, and a law was passed which provided that the purchasers of that road could organize a corporation by whatever name they chose, and that the purchasers could make the capital stock of that corporation $350,000,000. There was no limit whatever as to bonds. The stock, however, was limited to $350,000,000. The Senator can look over that law, and he will find that there were no guards whatever attached against excessive capitalization, it being quite possible for that corporation to issue shares for a dollar a share, though the par value is $100; and the act provides that whatever may be paid for the stock, the stock shall be thereafter regarded as full-paid stock.

That act gave the most ample powers without any restriction or restraint or control of any supervising body. I can understand how it was done. The people were anxious to have the railroad system of the South built up, and they were glad to have the cooperation of any body of capitalists who would do it. So this extraordinary charter was given. As I stated, it allows this little 300-mile railroad to issue $350,000,000 of stock. It does not provide that that stock shall be issued only for money paid or for property at its value, but under those provisions watered stock to almost any extent can be given out.

As I have stated, stock could be given for a dollar a share, and yet afterwards it would be regarded as full-paid stock at a hundred dollars a share. Unlimited power is given with reference to bonds, and then it gives the power to "lease, use, operate, consolidate with" * * * "any railroad or transportation company now or hereafter incorporated by the laws of the United States."

The State of Virginia had no objection to consolidating with any corporation organized under the laws of the United States. There is the sanction now, so far as Virginia is concerned, to this very proposition—"or of any of the States thereof, or any one or more of such railroad or transportation companies."

There are liberal provisions of this kind which I shall insert in the RECORD. The power is given to purchase, hold, and own bonds or stocks of other corporations, and also the power to purchase and guarantee "the stocks and bonds, or either, of hotel, lighterage, wharf, elevating, and other such enterprises convenient in connection therewith or as a part thereof." The company may classify its stock as it chooses and give preferences as it chooses, and then comes the following clause:

Such new corporation may borrow money and issue bonds or other evidence of indebtedness therefor, and may secure the same from time to time by mortgage or deed of trust upon any or all of its property and franchises; and such new corporation, from time to time, may issue and sell its bonds and its capital stock at such prices and on such terms as shall be specified in said plan of organization, or as a majority in amount of the stockholders shall approve at any meeting, and may receive in payment therefor property, securities, or shares in any corporation mentioned in this act; and any stock so issued shall be deemed fully paid and free from any liability.

Now, the Atlantic Coast Line was incorporated under a similar law. Contrast that law with the State of Texas, where they will not permit consolidation with any corporation outside of the State, and where in the State itself consolidation is absolutely controlled by the regulating commission. Contrast it also with the laws of Texas, which provide that there shall be no issue of bonds or stocks except for money paid or property delivered at its actual value, and that there shall be no issue of either bonds or stocks without the approval of the railroad commission of that State. Contrast it with the laws of Massachusetts, which equally guard against overcapitalization and provide that bonds shall only be issued for money actually received or for the property delivered at its value and also provide that there shall be no issue of bonds or stocks without the approval of the railroad commission.

In both of those States you have absolute guards against overcapitalization; but these great combinations in seeking the power for combination, seek the States, the laxity of whose laws puts a premium upon consolidation and combination. They turn to States such as New Jersey and New York and Pennsylvania, whose legislation is almost altogether controlled by the railroads.

Mr. BACON. But no single one of the corporate powers given by either of those States can be exercised beyond the limits of the particular State thus granting the franchises, without the consent of the State in which it is to be exercised.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true.

Mr. BACON. But by the legislation which the Senator contemplates a railroad would have the right to exercise such franchises regardless of the consent of the States.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So far as interstate commerce is concerned.

Mr. BACON. Well, if they are interstate railroads, if the suggestion of the Senator is a tenable one, they would necessarily be roads which run from one State into another, and through States into other States, and throughout their whole length they would be interstate commerce roads.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So far as interstate commerce is concerned, they ought to be free from the control of the States. They are now free from control of the States.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstands me. I mean so far as the exercise of corporate franchises is concerned. As it now is, no railroad company chartered in one State can exercise corporate franchises in another State without the consent of that State; and under the Senator's scheme, if it is to be operative, of course it would not be a matter of consent on the part of the State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So far as the acquisition of existing lines is concerned my proposition does not involve acquisition without the consent of the States, and the States may impose any condition they choose upon that consent, just as they would in the case of a corporation organized under the law of a sister State.

There is another section which I have drawn here regarding the acquisition of interstate railroads. It is as follows:

SEC. 19. Such corporation may, with the consent of any State, upon the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, acquire the railroad of any corporation now organized under the laws of such State, and may issue for the purchase thereof such amount of bonds and stock as may be authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission; but such authorization shall only be made after a public hearing, at which the Attorney-General shall appear, either personally or by one of his assistants, and no issue of bonds or stock therefor shall exceed the value of such road as ascertained by said Commission.

With the consent of the State under which any railroad corporation is or may be organized, merger between such corporation and a corporation organized under this act may be accomplished under this act, and bonds and stock may be issued by any corporation organized under this act for such purpose, provided such proposed merger is approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the bonds and stock issued in the accomplishment of such merger are also approved by such Commission.

So the rights of the States are protected just as much as where a corporation, organized under the laws of a foreign State, is conducting the transportation of a particular State. The difficulty about the present system is, as I have already stated, that these corporations uniformly resort for their charters to the States whose laws are most lax, and the result is overcapitalization, which is injurious to the entire country.

It may be said that this overcapitalization is not to be considered in the matter of the regulation of rates; and yet, as a matter of fact, it should be. These bonds and stocks are put out upon the country. The railroads make strenuous efforts to secure an income that will pay an interest upon them. They finally get a place and a value in the markets of the country; they fall into the hands of the purchasing public; and there is not a regulating board in the country that will not consider the value that has been built up in this way, and justly so, because society has stood by and allowed these values to accumulate without taking action to prevent it.

Upon this question of capitalization, I should say that even if we do not frame a national incorporation act, we should put a provision in this bill declaring that no corporation engaged in interstate commerce shall hereafter issue bonds and stocks without the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. KEAN. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I shall offer it.

Mr. President, I ask permission to incorporate in my remarks some quotations from the laws of various States regarding the control of capitalization and also some authorities.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I now wish to call attention to the great advance that is being made in the value of these securities, and unless we arrest it by providing for the control of capitalization by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the control of the return on their capital, we will find that this advance will increase in the near future. Thus, for instance, in 1896 the lowest quotation for New York Central was 88; in 1900 it was 125⅜; in 1905 it was 136½. The highest quotation for these years was in 1896, 99⅛; in 1900, 145⅜; in 1905, 167¾.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator the quotations for the years 1893 to 1897?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think they would be illuminating.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I imagine the quotations were then lower.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; very much lower.

Mr. NEWLANDS. For Pennsylvania, the lowest quotation in these three years was in 1896, when it was 99½; in 1900, 124⅜; in 1905, 131½. The highest quotation in these years was in 1896, 109½; in 1900, 149½; in 1905, 143¾.

In the case of the Northern Pacific, the lowest quotations in these three years were as follows: In 1896, 12½; in 1900, 45¾; in 1905, 165; and for the same years the highest quotations were: In 1896, 14⅜; in 1900, 86½; in 1905, 216½.

In the case of the Great Northern, the lowest quotations were: In 1896, 108½; in 1900, 144½; in 1905, 236. The highest quotations were: In 1896, 122; in 1900, 191½; in 1905, 335.

Let me say here, that the consolidation of the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific was broken up by the Northern Securities decision. There can be no doubt that most of these mergers which have been accomplished are subject to the same legal objections to which that merger was subject; but they have not been tested in the courts. It would be a great misfortune to the country if these consolidations were broken up; I believe that consolidation is beneficial to the country. The burden imposed by consolidations arises from the fact that they are uncontrolled—uncontrolled as to capitalization and uncontrolled as to return on capital. From present indications, from the returns of these various companies, I have not the slightest doubt that after this rate legislation is over, unless national machinery for consolidation with proper guards is provided, these railroads will combine with a capitalization greater than ever has been known in the history of the country.

I shall print in my remarks the pertinent sections of a bill for national incorporation, which I am preparing, and shall close my remarks to-morrow.

The sections referred to are as follows:

Suggestions as to leading provisions of a national incorporation act for railroads.

FORMATION.

SECTION 1. Any number of persons not less than fifteen may, under this act, form a corporation for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating an interstate railroad, or for the purpose of acquiring and operating a railroad or railroads, already constructed and engaged in interstate commerce.

CAPITALIZATION.

SEC. 3. Such corporation shall issue only such amount of bonds and stock as may be necessary for the construction, purchase, and equipment of the railroads constructed or acquired. No bonds or stock shall be issued except for money paid or for property acquired at its actual value. The amount of such issue of stock or bonds shall in every case require the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall grant public hearing regarding the same, to which all parties interested shall by public notice given by the Commission be invited. The United States shall be represented at such hearing by the Attorney-General or one of his assistants. The Commission shall certify in writing to the incorporators or to the corporation its determination, and shall record the same in its records, and all bonds and stock not issued in compliance with such determination shall be void as against such corporation.

REPORTS.

SEC. 14. All corporations formed under this act shall make to the Interstate Commerce Commission such reports as are now by law required to be made to said Commission, and such further reports as the rules of said Commission shall from time to time require.

TAXATION.

SEC. 17. National corporations duly organized under this act are hereby declared to be military and post roads and instrumentalities for the regulation of interstate commerce. The franchises, stocks, bonds, fixed evidences of indebtedness, operations, and traffic, and the corporation itself, shall be exempt from all taxation by any State or Territory other than as provided in this act, but the property of such corporation, including its right of way, track, real estate, stations, office buildings, and equipment, shall be subject to assessment and at such average percentage of their actual value as shall be customary with reference to other property in such State or Territory. In lieu of such tax any State or Territory may impose a tax not exceeding 4 per cent on such proportion of the gross receipts of such corporation as the number of miles of track in such State or Territory bear to the total miles of track operated by such corporation. In estimating the miles of track, each mile of second track shall be regarded as equal to one-half mile of track, and each mile of third or fourth track or siding shall be estimated as equal to one-third of each mile of main track. For the purpose of computation by each State the Interstate Commerce Commission shall certify to the taxing authorities of each State or Territory the gross receipts for the preceding year of the total mileage, as aforesaid, and the proportion of such total mileage operated in such State or Territory.

STATE POLICE AND STATE RATES.

SEC. 18. Nothing herein contained shall be construed as interfering with the police laws of any State regarding railroads incorporated under this act and operating in such States, nor shall anything herein contained be construed as affecting the right and power of each State to regulate purely State commerce on railroads organized under this act. But the Interstate Commerce Commission may hold conferences from time to time with the regulating power of any State with a view to such harmonious adjustment and regulation of State commerce and interstate commerce as will protect the public against abuses or extortion, and the railroads against inadequate returns upon their investment, and promote the efficiency of such corporations as common carriers.

ACQUISITION OF STATE RAILROADS.

SEC. 19. Such corporation may, with the consent of any State, upon the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, acquire the railroad of any corporation now organized under the laws of such State, and may issue for the purchase thereof such amount of bonds and stock as may be authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission; but such authorization shall only be made after a public hearing, at which the Attorney-General shall appear, either personally or by one of his assistants, and no issue of bonds or stock therefor shall exceed the value of such road as ascertained by said Commission.

With the consent of the State under which any railroad corporation is or may be organized, merger between such corporation and a corporation organized under this act may be accomplished under this act, and bonds and stock may be issued by any corporation organized under this act for such purpose, provided such proposed merger is approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the bonds and stocks issued in the accomplishment of such merger are also approved by such Commission.

ACCIDENT AND INSURANCE FUND.

SEC. 20. It shall be a condition of the grant and continuance of any franchise to do business under this act that the corporation holding such franchise shall set aside annually 1 per cent of the gross receipts of said corporation, to be held as a fund in the Treasury of the United States for the payment of pensions to the employees of such corporation who shall have been disqualified for active service either by injury in the service or by age. The amount and time of payments, the investment of the fund, the disbursing of the same, and the entire management thereof, shall be under rules and regulations to be made and from time to time altered by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

BOARD OF CONCILIATION.

SEC. 21. The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed to act as a board of conciliation between corporations organized under this act and their employees as to any dispute arising between said corporation and its employees in the matter of compensation, hours and conditions of labor, the protection of life and limb of said employees, and such power shall be exercised by such Commission in accordance with rules and regulations to be made, and from time to time altered, by said Commission.

PENALTIES.

SEC. 22. Any officer, director, or agent of such corporation who shall be engaged in promoting or opposing any legislation or governmental action, either national or State, shall from time to time make oath to the Interstate Commerce Commission to a statement of his expenditures made in that behalf. No corporation organized under this act shall make any expenditure whatever for the purpose of aiding or defeating any political party or candidate for office, and for every such offense such corporation shall, on conviction, be subject to a fine of dollars.

Any officer, director, or agent of such corporation who shall willfully and knowingly make, assist in making, cause or direct to be made any false statement, material misrepresentation, or false entry in any book, report, return, account, or certificate required by the act to be kept, made, or filed, shall be, upon conviction, subject to a fine of not more than —— dollars, or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, and shall furthermore be liable in a civil action for damages caused to any creditor or stockholder thereby.

Any officer, director, or agent of such corporation who shall willfully refuse or neglect to perform any duty imposed upon him by this act for which refusal or neglect a penalty is not therein otherwise expressly provided, shall be subject, upon conviction, to a fine of not more than —— dollars, or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

All fines under this act shall be paid into the accident and insurance fund aforesaid.

DIVIDENDS.

SEC. 23. No such corporation shall pay or distribute to its stockholders in any form during any one year a dividend or dividends exceeding in total amount 5 per cent upon the entire capital stock. If after the payment by such corporation of its operating expenses, maintenance, improvements, and betterments, its taxes, its interest on bonded or other indebtedness, and its contribution to the accident and insurance fund, there shall be a surplus over and above the amount necessary to pay such dividend of 5 per cent per annum, the surplus shall be apportioned as follows: One-half thereof shall be paid into a guaranty fund in the Treasury of the United States for future dividends in case of a slackening of business, such fund to be controlled and invested by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and one-half thereof shall be paid into the accident and insurance fund provided for by this act.

No reduction of rates as to any given railroad shall be made or ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, or by any other governmental agency, which shall make it reasonably probable that such 5 per cent dividends can not be earned upon the total capital stock of the corporation.

JURISDICTION OF SUITS BY AND AGAINST RAILWAY COMPANIES.

SEC. 24. All national railway companies incorporated under the laws of the United States shall, for the purpose of all actions by or against them, whether at law or in equity, be deemed citizens of the States in which they are respectively operating, and in such cases United States circuit and district courts shall not have jurisdiction other than such as they would have in case such corporations were individual citizens of such States, respectively. The provisions of this section shall not be held to affect the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in cases in which the United States is a party or cases for winding up the affairs of any such corporation.

RULES.

SEC. 25. The Interstate Commerce Commission may make rules necessary for the complete enforcement of the provisions of this act, and from time to time alter, amend, or repeal the same.

AMENDMENT OR REPEAL.

SEC. 26. This act shall be at all times subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by act of Congress.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand the Senator can not conclude his remarks this afternoon, I will, with his consent, move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have but very little more to add to what I have already said.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 10,000 extra copies of the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in consideration of the so-called "railroad rate bill," with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 5,000 copies of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, Fifty-ninth Congress, at the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., on the subject of hazing at the Annapolis Naval Academy, etc.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PUNISHMENT FOR HAZING AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 5,000 copies of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, Fifty-ninth Congress, at the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., on the subject of hazing at the Naval Academy, with accompanying report, 3,500 copies for the House of Representatives and 1,500 for the Senate.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate relative to the printing of 10,000 extra copies of the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in consideration of the so-called "railroad rates bill;" which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in the consideration of the so-called "railroad rates bill" and a digest of said testimony prepared under the direction of said committee, 100 copies for the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, 100 copies for the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 2,900 copies for the use of the Senate, and 6,900 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 5, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 4, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DENATURED ALCOHOL.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 17453) for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FANNIE DINER.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 132) permitting the waiving of the alien immigration law in the case of Fannie Diner.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he hereby is, authorized to waive the provisions of "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved March 3, 1903, in the case of Fannie Diner, if, after investigation, he deem such waiver proper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York whether this bill provides for more than one person?

Mr. BENNET of New York. One person.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I did not hear the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That only relates to one individual case, I believe.

Mr. BENNET of New York. One person.

Mr. FINLEY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman what is the necessity for this resolution?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, the Diner family is a German family which six or seven years ago consisted of a father and mother, three daughters, and a son. The son immigrated to the United States some time previous, and for more than ten years has been an American citizen. Some time after he left Germany his father, for business reasons, took the family into Russia. Some time after that one of the daughters came here, making the son and daughter residents of America.

Mr. FINLEY. This is simply to permit the balance of the family to join the son and daughter, who are American citizens?

Mr. BENNET of New York. That is it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from New York whether he does not think that the joint resolution ought to cover all cases of that kind. There are many such cases, and I am sure the gentleman from New York will join me in an expression of opinion that these cases ought to be covered generally by resolution, and that we ought not to pick out any one individual case.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will simply say that that is not the resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNET of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HAZING AT THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following concurrent resolution, which is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana offers a House concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution No. 26.

Resolved, That there be printed 5,000 copies of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, Fifty-ninth Congress, at the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., on the subject of hazing at the Naval Academy, with accompanying report.

With the following amendment:

After "report," insert "3,500 copies for the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the Senate."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana what has become of his scheme for having a piecemeal printing of these things?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that that scheme will be applied in this instance. We have recommended of this publication 5,000 copies.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many are you going to have actually printed the first crack out of the box?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Possibly a thousand or fifteen hundred.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that will be fully as many as anybody on earth will ever want of them.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. We shall consult with the superintendents of the folding rooms of the House and Senate and agree on a first edition.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY AS TO RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged Senate concurrent resolution, with amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 13.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 10,000 extra copies of the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in the consideration of the so-called "railroad rates bill," 3,000 for the use of the Senate and 7,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

With the following substitute amendment, proposed by the Committee on Printing:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there be printed 10,000 additional copies of the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in the consideration of the so-called "railroad rates bill" and a digest of said testimony prepared under the direction of said committee, 100 copies for the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, 100 copies for the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 2,900 copies for the use of the Senate, and 6,900 copies for the use of the House of Representatives."

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman how many copies have heretofore been printed?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The resolution that came over from the Senate provided for 10,000 copies. This is an amendment, which places 100 copies with each of the two committees.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is a Senate resolution?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does it not say for printing of so many additional copies?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The usual number has been printed. The number allowed the committee was printed.

Mr. TAWNEY. They were not printed by concurrent resolution of the House and Senate?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. No; they were printed under the authority of the committee of the Senate.

Mr. TAWNEY. And the first edition is entirely exhausted?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Those that were printed for the Senate committee are exhausted. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that while this authorizes an edition of 10,000, probably not more than one-third of that number will be printed, the quota being fixed on a basis of 10,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's report, as it seems to the Chair, is a substitute in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. It is intended as a substitute for Senate resolution 13, and covers the provisions of Senate resolution 12.

The SPEAKER. That is, for the text. The gentleman's motion, as the Chair understands it, substitutes what he reports for the Senate concurrent resolution, striking out all after the word "Resolved" in the concurrent resolution as it comes from the Senate, and insert a substitute read by the Clerk.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he has an estimate of the probable cost of this work?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The estimated cost for 10,000 copies is $27,122.

Mr. PAYNE. How many copies does the substitute call for?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The same number, but I will say that the first edition will probably not exceed 3,000 copies, and under the provisions of the joint resolution recently passed there will be saved in the neighborhood of $16,000.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope there will not be more than 3,000 copies printed.

Mr. TAWNEY. How many volumes of this testimony is included in this report?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Six volumes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Bound in paper or in cloth?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I think it is contemplated that they shall be bound in paper.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does that include the index?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. In view of the large number of volumes, and the fact that a great many have already been distributed, does not the gentleman think that in 3,000 he is providing for more than actually will be needed?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say that that was simply an estimate.

Mr. TAWNEY. What would a second edition cost?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. That would depend on the size. The estimated cost of the entire number is $27,122—the entire number of 10,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The question was taken; and the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following House resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution No. 374.

Resolved, That there be printed and bound together in paper covers 1,000 additional copies of House Document No. 326, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, and House Document No. 235, Fifty-sixth Congress, second session, with accompanying maps and illustrations, for the use of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire what are these documents?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I will say for the information of the gentleman from New York that this resolution refers to House documents relating to surveys of the Big Sandy River, West Virginia, and they are to be reprinted for the use of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. The estimated cost is $105.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he at least put the title of the document in the resolution, not for my information, but for the information of the House.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to.

SUPERINTENDENT OF REPORTERS' GALLERY.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 373.

Resolved, That Charles H. Mann is hereby appointed superintendent of the reporters' gallery of the House, at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for; and the Committee on Appropriations is hereby authorized and directed to provide for the salary of said position from and after June 30, 1906, in one of the general appropriation bills: Provided, That the position hereby created shall be in lieu of that of the messenger to the reporters' gallery now provided for by law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this employee is one of the men who has heretofore been carried as messenger to the Doorkeeper?

Mr. CASSEL. He is. I would say that this gentleman has been employed in this position for a long time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that this employee was one of thirteen messengers under the Doorkeeper who have been receiving a salary of $1,200 a year each. There are thirteen other messengers under the Doorkeeper who have received salaries at the rate of $1,000 a year, and in the recent legislative appropriation bill the salaries were made uniform on the basis of $1,100 a year. Now, this resolution takes this particular messenger out of the operation of that amendment to the legislative appropriation bill and puts him back at the salary of $1,200 a year. I think he is entitled to the salary of $1,200 a year, and I think the other messengers were also, but it strikes me that it is hardly a fair deal to take one out of the thirteen and give him $1,200 a year, restore him to his original salary, and leave the balance of them at a salary of $1,100 a year, being a reduction of $100 a year each. That is the only comment I care to make on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

LAW BOOKS FOR COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 347.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House furnish the Committee on Revision of the Laws with the following works and books, to be paid for from the contingent fund of the House, namely: One set of Federal Cases (30 volumes) and Digest (1 volume); one set of Federal Reporter (139 volumes) and Digest (5 volumes), and Bouvier's Law Dictionary, latest edition (2 volumes).

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear very well, and I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what committee it is that is to have these?

Mr. CASSEL. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws. The members state that it is absolutely necessary to have these books in order to accomplish their work.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that this committee has access at all times to two law libraries here in the House end of the Capitol, one the Supreme Court library and one right over here?

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I opposed this resolution for quite a while, believing there were sufficient copies of these laws to be had. But a number of the lawyers in the House tell me that they can not do good business unless they have their books in their own office, and consequently we have decided that this is a good investment for this committee.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a very important and necessary resolution, and it ought to pass. This Committee on the Revision of the Laws is doing a very important work at the present time in codifying the laws, and the House ought to aid the committee in every way it can by giving it the necessary implements wherewith to work, the law books needed for immediate reference. The cost is infinitesimal. I trust there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

SPECIAL EMPLOYEE IN DOCUMENT ROOM.

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 124.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to appoint W. P. Scott as a special employee in the Clerk's document room, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided for by law.

With the following amendment:

In line 3 strike out the words "two thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "fifteen hundred."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear from the gentleman about the purpose and effect of this resolution and the necessity for this additional employee. This man is already employed?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; he is not.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would ask if this creates a new place in the document room?

Mr. CASSEL. Mr. Speaker, this creates a new place, not in the document room, but under the Superintendent of the Capitol. Mr. Wood, in preparing the new office building of the House, needs some one to assist him in laying out the plans for the storage of the documents belonging to the House. This gentleman is the most efficient he could secure for the place, and it has been at his request that we have reported this resolution, so that he may be assisted in preparing the rooms for the storage of documents in the new office building. This has been approved by the building commission of the new building.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The office, however, will die with the individual. If this is a necessary office, why specify the incumbent? If Mr. Scott is the proper person to appoint, Mr. Wood can select him. Why not provide for an additional place at a salary of $1,500 a year, to run as soon as there is need for it, and giving the power of selection to the Superintendent or any other person who is the proper person?

Mr. CASSEL. I would state that the House has the power at all times to remove any employee appointed by resolution of this kind, and to appoint somebody in his place if he is removed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. As a rule, Mr. Speaker, I do not like the idea of creating an office and at the same time naming the incumbent, because when he retires the office, of course, becomes extinct and it is necessary to create another office. It does not strike me that that, as a general proposition, is good policy. It may be all right, however, in this case.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

TO INCORPORATE THE NATIONAL GERMAN-AMERICAN ALLIANCE.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 11273.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11273) to incorporate The National German-American Alliance.

Be it enacted, etc., That C. J. Hexamer, M. D. Learned, Adolph Timm, John Weber, Hans Weniger, H. C. Bloedel, all of the State of Pennsylvania; John Tjarks, of the State of Maryland; C. C. Lienau, of the State of New Jersey; Kurt Voelckner, of the District of Columbia; H. A. C. Anderson, of the State of New York; Gustave Bender, of the State of Texas; Joseph Keller, of the State of Indiana; F. O. Martin, of the State of Idaho; Gustav Halbach, of the State of Ohio; H. J. Nienstedt, of the State of Minnesota, officers and members of the National German-American Alliance of the United States of America, and their successors, be, and they are hereby, incorporated and made a body politic and corporate of the District of Columbia under the name of "The National German-American Alliance of the United States of America." And by that name they and their successors may have and use a common seal, and may alter and change the same at pleasure, and may make by-laws and elect officers and agents, and may take, receive, hold, and convey real and personal estate necessary for the purposes of the society.

SEC. 2. That this corporation shall be perpetual and have all the privileges accorded by existing laws or that may hereafter be enacted by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 3. That this corporation, composed of the individuals aforesaid and their associates, under the name and style aforesaid, is formed for the purposes as follows: The conservation of the principles of representative government and the protection and maintenance of all civil and political rights; the protection of German immigrants against imposition and deception and to assist in their naturalization; the study of American institutions and the publication of American history; the cultivation of the German language, literature, and drama, and the perpetuation of the memory and deeds of those early German pioneers whose influence has been of incalculable benefit to the intellectual and economic development of this country and whose loyalty in times of stress and strife is a matter of history.

SEC. 4. That said corporation shall have a constitution and shall have power to amend the same at pleasure: Provided, That such constitution or amendments thereof do not conflict with the laws of the United States or of any State.

SEC. 5. That said corporation shall have the right to hold its meetings at any place within the United States as may be best suited or most advantageous to the carrying out of the purposes for which this corporation is formed.

SEC. 6. That said corporation shall not engage in any business for gain, the purposes of said corporation being educational and patriotic.

SEC. 7. That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation from the gentleman from Missouri regarding this bill.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to give my friend from New York such information as I have on this subject. This bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary. It relates to an organization with branch organizations in thirty-three or thirty-four States of the Union. It has a membership of about a million and a half, consequently it can be justly said that the organization is national in scope. It is also patriotic in character. The purposes of the organization are stated best in the terms of the bill itself, namely:

The conservation of the principles of representative government and the protection and maintenance of all civil and political rights; the protection of German immigrants against imposition and deception and to assist in their naturalization; the study of American institutions and the publication of American history.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me? I have just read over the bill, and I am in favor of the bill; but I observe from reading it that there is only one representative from the great State of New York, which is a very large State, having a large population of German-Americans, and I would suggest to the gentleman that he allow me to suggest an amendment by adding the names of John B. Hasslocher and John P. Schuchman, of New York. Mr. Schuchman is a distinguished citizen and a very prominent lawyer in New York, and Mr. Hasslocher is one of the best-known and most popular business men in this country. I think it will strengthen the bill by adding the names of these distinguished gentlemen from the State of New York.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will say to the gentleman that my own city, St. Louis, is not represented.

Mr. SULZER. It should be, in my opinion.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is, Missouri is not represented.

Mr. SULZER. But that——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Allow me to explain this—though we have in Missouri a very strong branch organization. The men mentioned here are presidents of the State organizations which originally organized and constituted this alliance.

Mr. SULZER. Who is the president of the organization in the State of New York?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It seems that New York came in later. As the States came in the State organizations elected their presidents, and those several presidents are now named in this bill as incorporators.

Mr. SULZER. Have you any objection to my amendment to make Mr. Hasslocher and Mr. Schuchman incorporators?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I have no authority to accept any additional suggestion of that kind.

Mr. SULZER. Well, if I propose the amendment, will the gentleman object to it?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then I would have to move to insert some one from my own State.

Mr. SULZER. I think you ought to do it. I think you ought to put in the name of some distinguished German-American from your own district.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It is the same as in the case of the thirteen original colonies; you could not very well make them fourteen, because there were only thirteen.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. But we added to their number and made them States.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill, and I hope it will pass unanimously, but I think the gentleman from Missouri makes a mistake when he confines the names of the incorporators to the presidents of the original organizations. I think he ought to widen its scope and extend its usefulness, and I hope the gentleman will accept my amendment for the good of the cause we both have at heart.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve my right to object. I would like to know what is the necessity for creating a national organization along the line of heretofore nationality in this country. But I would like to know what rights of emigrants are invaded that makes it necessary for Congress to organize a national society to protect those rights. I would like to know what defects there are in the naturalization laws of the United States, presided over by the courts, that makes it necessary that Congress should authorize a national society to secure the naturalization of those gentlemen under those national laws. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is something more in this bill than what appears upon its surface; that this is not a mere social organization, but that it is political in character. I doubt seriously whether it is wise for the Congress of the United States, along national lines, to organize societies of this kind. It looks to me as if it was very questionable policy for us to do so; and that the organization of this society is a reflection upon the legislation of the country and upon the administration of the laws of the country. I would like to have the gentleman explain the necessity before I will give consent.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to explain the bill further, and meet the objections raised by the gentleman from Iowa. This is not an organization along national lines at all; it is thoroughly and purely an American organization. No man can become a member of it who is not a citizen of the United States. It is constituted for the purpose of aiding German immigrants, for instance, in their process of assimilation, in their process of naturalization, by explaining to them American institutions and American laws; and that purpose, it seems to me, is not only commendable, but should command the support and encouragement of Congress and of every man who is a Member of it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the propriety of calling this organization "German-American?" What is the propriety of using the term "German-American?" I have heard it condemned many a time, and I have had a great deal of sympathy with that condemnation. No man, I think, has a greater admiration for the American who comes here from Germany and changes his allegiance to the American nation, but upon what propriety is that hyphenated designation kept up after a man has cast in his fealty with the American people?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize, like the gentleman from Ohio, with every effort to eliminate hyphenation of terms in this country, but the term "German-American" is not meant in a political sense, because all these men are thorough Americans. It is meant more in an ethnological sense. They are simply speaking that language which will enable them to be of assistance and aid to the immigrants coming to this country from Germany.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that as far as immigration is concerned, I regret very much that immigration from Germany has dwindled to almost nothing. About ten years ago we had from 180,000 to 200,000 Germans coming to this country every year; and I believe the Members of this House will bear me out when I say, modestly, that they are good citizens, and that they have contributed to what is best in the blood of this country. But of recent years this immigration has decreased considerably, until now there are only from 20,000 to 30,000 a year. But we are about to pass a bill changing the naturalization laws. That bill has in it a provision which obliges the applicant to read and write the English language. For the purpose of enabling him to do so; for the purpose of enabling the man who works from morning to night and has no chance to acquire knowledge of this kind, this organization proposes to establish night schools open to all and enabling all to become proficient in a knowledge of the English language, so that everything that appeals to us from the standpoint of good American citizenship is in favor of this bill. It intends to make Americans out of German immigrants, and to assimilate them with us quicker and more thoroughly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEPBURN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

FLATHEAD INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8461) to amend chapter 1495 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," as amended by section 9 of chapter 1479 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, with a Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to nonconcur in the Senate amendment and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

CHAMBERLAIN LAND DISTRICT, SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15328) to approve certain final proofs in the Chamberlain land district, South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all homestead final proofs for lands in the Chamberlain land district in South Dakota, made before the judge or clerk of the court of Stanley County, or any United States court commissioner at Fort Pierre, S. Dak., prior to July 1, 1905, shall be accepted and patented the same as if such proofs were made within the said Chamberlain land district: Provided, That this act shall not affect any final proof except only in respect to the place where same was made.

With the following amendment:

In lines 6 and 7, after the word "to," strike out "July 1, 1905" and insert "the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

TOWN SITES ON IRRIGATION LANDS.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 87) providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes, which has already been read, together with its amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which has already been reported, the title of which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FORT CRITTENDEN MILITARY RESERVATION, UTAH.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12323) to permit the State of Utah to select lands in any abandoned military reservation in Utah.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of Utah shall have the right to select school indemnity or other lands granted to the State by the enabling act providing for the admission of said State into the Union from within the limits of any abandoned military reservation in Utah, and said lands are hereby made subject to such selection.

SEC. 2. That the general laws for the disposal of the public lands of the United States are hereby extended and made applicable to the lands comprised within the limits of said abandoned Fort Crittenden Military Reservation in said State.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all of section 1 and substitute section 2 as section 1.

Amend by striking out the word "said" at the beginning of line 12, page 1, of the bill as printed, and insert the word "the."

Strike out the word "said" at the end of line 12 and insert the word "the."

Strike out the period after the word "State" at the end of the bill and add the words "of Utah," and insert a period after the last word.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to understand what this bill does. The bill itself is pretty broad. I do not know what changes are made by the amendment.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. The bill merely extends the general land laws of the country to the Fort Crittenden Military Reservation, in Utah. This reservation comprises about 173,000 acres. The land has never been used for military purposes and never will be. The purpose of the bill is simply to make the land within that reservation subject to the general land laws of the country, and to permit State selections of same in satisfaction of grants to the State or for indemnity lands as provided by law. This vast tract of public lands was arbitrarily set aside as a military reservation nearly half a century ago. It is an arid country and poorly adapted for homestead settlement. The Commissioner, to whom the bill was submitted, and thereafter amended at his suggestion, reported as follows:

While the right to grant to the State the privilege of selection of these lands is exclusively with Congress, I am of the opinion that the established policy in relation to abandoned military reservations should not be generally disturbed, though instances may arise where such a policy, being too restrictive, should be changed, and such a case is found in the abandoned Fort Crittenden Reservation. This reservation, with an area of 173,644.68 acres, was relinquished July 22, 1884. For ten years the land was subjected to entry under act of 1884, and since the passage of the act of August 23, 1894, has been subject to settlement and entry under that act, and during the entire period of twenty-two years it is estimated that less than 13,000 acres have been disposed of.

In view, therefore, of the extraordinary large area within this reserve, and the apparent fact that settlement claims can not be made advantageously under the restrictions of the act of 1894, I recommend that the general laws for the disposal of the public lands of the United States be extended and made applicable to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Reservation in Utha.

Should this be done the State would then acquire the right to make selections of lands therein.

The bill has been unanimously reported with amendments by the Committee on the Public Lands, and ought to become a law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWELL of Utah, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to extend the public-land laws of the United States to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Military Reservation, in the State of Utah."

KIOWA, COMANCHE, AND APACHE INDIAN RESERVATIONS, OKLA.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17507) to open for settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all of that part of article 3 of section 6 of the act of Congress of date June 6, 1900, entitled "An act to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Indians of the Fort Hall Indian Reservation, in Idaho," and making appropriations to carry the same into effect, which reads as follows, to wit: "That in addition to the allotment of lands to said Indians as provided for in this agreement the Secretary of the Interior shall set aside for the use in common for said Indian tribes 480,000 acres of grazing land to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior either in one or more tracts, as will best subserve the interests of said Indians," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That the 480,000 acres of land set apart in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory, by the Secretary of the Interior, referred to and mentioned in section 1 of this act, and the 25,000 acres of land set apart as a wood reservation in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory, by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be opened to settlement by proclamation of the President of the United States within three months from the passage of this act and be disposed of upon sealed bids or at public auction, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, to the highest bidder, under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States and under the rules and regulations adopted by the Secretary of the Interior, and such purchaser must be duly qualified to make entry under the general homestead laws: And provided further, That the money arising from the sale of said lands shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of said tribes of Indians, and said deposit of money shall draw 4 per cent interest per annum; and the principal and interest of said deposit shall be expended for the benefit of said Indians in such manner as Congress may direct. And it is also provided that such sales shall be subject to any leases made for agricultural purposes prior to this act, the rentals accruing after such sale to belong to the purchasers under this act.

SEC. 3. That said lands shall be sold for not less than $5 per acre, and shall be sold upon the following terms: One-fifth of the price bid therefor to be paid at the time the bid is made and the balance of the purchase price of said land to be paid in four equal annual installments; and in case any purchaser fails to make such annual payment when due all rights in and to the land covered by his or her purchase shall at once cease and any payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and his or her entry shall be canceled. And no title to said land shall inure to the purchaser, nor any patent of the United States issue to the purchaser, until the purchaser shall have in all respects complied with the terms and provisions of the homestead laws of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby vested with full power and authority to make such rules and regulations as to the time of notice, manner of sale, and other matters incident to the carrying out of the provisions of this act as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 5. That all lands remaining undisposed of at the expiration of five years from the taking effect of this act shall be disposed of for cash, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior shall allot 160 acres of land to each child of Indian parentage born since June 6, 1900, whose father or mother was a duly enrolled member of either the Kiowa, Comanche, or Apache tribes of Indians and entitled to an allotment of land under the act of June 6, 1900, opening said Kiowa, Comanche, or Apache reservations to settlement, said allotments to be made out of the lands known as the pasture reserves in said reservations.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 2, line 10, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six;" in line 16, same page, strike out the word "And;" in line 17, same page, strike out the word "further;" in line 23, same page, strike out the words "And it is also;" and in the same line, after the word "provided," add the word "further."

On page 3, in line 25, section 6, add after the word "that" the words "prior to the said proclamation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask if this bill has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; three times, and it passed the House once this session, and also the Senate.

Mr. SULZER. Is it approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is in its present form. The Commissioner raised two objections to it in the form that it passed the House and Senate, and that is the reason that the bill was returned by the President to the House. One of his objections was that he wanted the Indian children born since 1900 to be enrolled and to receive an allotment of lands in these pasture reserves. The other objection was that the minimum price of $1.50 per acre was too low, and he desired it raised to $5 per acre. We have reconciled all of these objections in this bill, and it meets with no objection in its present form from any source known to me.

Mr. SULZER. Are the Indians themselves in favor of the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In 1892 the Indians agreed by treaty to the sale of all of these lands. In 1900 three and one-half million acres out of the entire reservation was opened for sale and settlement by act of Congress. This act, however, reserved 480,000 acres of pasture lands in the reservation for the Indians' use. In the meantime the country settled up and the old reservation has been divided up into three counties, these counties being among the best counties in Oklahoma. These pasture lands now being opened by this bill comprise the rest of the reservation, and were included in the original treaty with these Indians, and there is no objection to the bill. It has passed this House twice, once in last Congress and the House and Senate this Congress, and in its present form it has passed the Indian Committee of the House, and it has been reported from that committee at least three times. Objection was raised to the other bill, No. 431, in the Interior Department on the two points I have explained, and those objections have been obviated by this bill, so that now there is no objection to it.

Mr. SULZER. Do I understand the gentleman from Texas to say that the Indians of this reservation held a council and voted for this treaty?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They did, in 1892, in the usual way.

Mr. SULZER. And subsequently the Indians have never attempted in any way to rescind that treaty?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That treaty is still in force. It is satisfactory to the Indians and to the Interior Department, and there is no objection to the bill from any quarter that I know of now.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, upon that explanation I withdraw my objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, I yield to my colleague from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], who desires to ask a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, before the bill is acted upon I wish to get about five minutes to say something.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Which one?

The SPEAKER. To the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do.

Mr. PAYNE. Has any assent been received from the Indians since 1892 in reference to this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that they are now satisfied with the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. The Indians are satisfied with this disposition of the land?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They are—and my information comes through the Indian agent and through the Indian Office here—if the bill passes in its present form, as I have already fully explained.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Texas to yield five minutes to me.

The SPEAKER. That can be done when the House has consideration of the bill. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this bill, but I wish to call attention of the House to the extraordinary circumstances under which it now comes before the House. This bill passed Congress, was sent to the President under the provisions of the Constitution. It was his duty, if he approved the bill, to sign it, and if he did not approve it to return it to the House, in which it originated, with his objections. Instead of doing that, in some mysterious manner information was conveyed to gentlemen interested in the bill that unless the Congress passed a concurrent resolution recalling the bill from the President that he would veto it.

The President has certain rights and prerogatives under the Constitution, and so has the Congress. If the President does not approve of a bill, he should perform his duty and either permit it to become a law or veto it. Then Congress could exercise its right and determine whether it would pass the bill over his veto, or by having the bill reintroduced in a different form, pass it in the form in which it would then be.

I call attention at this time to this fact because this is the second time such an occurrence has happened during this session of Congress. In the last Congress the Indian appropriation bill went to the President. Instead of approving it, or returning it with his objections, or permitting it to become a law without action on his part, as it was his duty, he compelled Congress to pass three separate joint resolutions amending the bill that was then before him awaiting his action.

Mr. Speaker, there seems to be an innovation in the methods of legislation. The first section of the Constitution provides that "all legislative powers * * * shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Under this new dispensation all legislative power seems to be vested in a Congress consisting of three branches: The Senate, the House of Representatives, and the White House. And that this is not farfetched I call the attention of the House to the fact that in this very session there was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations a request that the term "Executive Mansion," where it occurred in the legislative bill, be changed to "White House."

There is another provision in the Constitution—section 3 of Article II—which directs the President "from time to time to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." But the present Executive has departed from that requirement of the Constitution. Within the last few weeks the Executive, in personal letters addressed to the heads of two great committees of Congress, the chairman of the Naval Committee of the Senate and the chairman of the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, recommended certain legislation and commended to those gentlemen the propriety of enacting the legislation that was recommended in those letters.

The other day the Executive wrote a personal letter to a gentleman who happened to be the chairman of a subcommittee of the House, congratulating him upon the efficient manner in which the chairman and the subcommittee had investigated the hazing conditions at the Naval Academy. Mr. Speaker, this is not Russia; the President is not a czar. The czar originates, legislates, and executes the laws. The President does not; he is not the source of all power in our Government. Under our Constitution the Executive has certain duties to perform, which are specifically enumerated and carefully defined. He should not attempt to increase or extend these powers. He should be jealous of his rights, and so should the Congress be keen to protect the powers lodged by the Constitution in Congress. At this time I shall be content with the statement that if the Executive follows a similar procedure in the future and has bills brought back here for amendment that, under a proper construction of the Constitution, he should either approve or disapprove or permit to become law without action, so far as I am concerned, those bills will not be considered in this House by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] perhaps has forgotten that the last Democratic President sent a letter to "My dear Catchings," in relation to a tariff bill, expressing his views about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I should like to state that if I had been fortunate enough to be in Congress at that time I would have taken the opportunity to express the same view of the impropriety of that action that I have of the present procedure.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, it was very unfortunate that the gentleman was not in Congress at that time. Possibly that bill might not have been passed in its objectionable form if he had been there. This legislation is in relation to certain tribes of Indians. The Executive has under his management the Secretary of the Interior Department and the Indian Bureau, and both of those Departments have special light and knowledge as to details that Congress is entitled to have. Unfortunately the Committee on Indian Affairs in preparing the legislation as to this bill were not informed of the fact that there were about fifty little Indians who had not received allotments who had been born since 1900, and that we were disposing of this property without taking care of their rights by giving each of them a farm. What could be more proper than for the Executive and the Indian Bureau to call the attention of the Members of Congress to this omission and to have it corrected? What could be more proper than for the House when it found an omission of this kind to respectfully ask the President to return the bill in order that it might make suitable provision, as was done in this case—not at all an unusual case.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And there was also one other objection—as to the price.

Mr. LACEY. And there was still another objection, as to the question of price; but I never regarded that as material, as the land will be sold at auction or under sealed bids and will bring all it is worth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make this suggestion, that if the President had pointed out those omissions in his veto it; but the word "veto" is an offensive one. It is a right manner. The objection I have is that it comes in this underground back-door manner, so that only one or two Members have knowledge of it.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, it is true that the President could veto it; but the word "veto" is an offensive one. It is a right of the Executive that ought seldom to be exercised when legislation like this, quasi private in its character, affecting the property rights of individuals, is being prepared. The Executive and the Indian Bureau are just as much interested as either House of Congress in protecting the rights of the individuals in relation to whom we legislate. We are the guardians of those Indians and this oversight occurred. It is now being corrected—corrected by a new bill. There is nothing at all unusual in it. Such a resolution as this has occurred in almost every Congress, and perhaps more than once in every Congress in which I have had the honor to serve.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for two or three minutes?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I agreed to yield first to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], to whom I now yield five minutes.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I wish only to draw attention to one or two of the peculiarities of this procedure. It seems a bill much like this bill was passed a short time ago, providing, among other things, a minimum price of $1.50 per acre for a large body of land, worth much more. It seems also that it passed without knowledge of the existence of a lot of young Indians deeply interested, whose presence was made known later by an investigation at the Interior Department. It appears also that gentlemen interested in the legislation, conferring with the President, learned that he probably would veto the bill on account of the low minimum price, and on account of no provision having been made for the young Indians. Then a resolution was adopted calling the bill back from the President to the House. Later a request was made for unanimous consent to amend the bill and send it again to the President, without the formality of any more legislation, except in that very informal and very summary way. Now, in view of these facts, the question naturally arises how it is that the Indian Committee knew so little about the matter when the subject dealt with is so large, a disposition, I believe, of half a million acres of valuable land. It was stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], when the matter was up the other day, that these lands would sell for at least $5 an acre; yet the minimum price of $1.50 an acre was fixed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that this land was to be sold to the highest bidder?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And that it might bring $100 an acre so far as that is concerned?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am aware of that, but I am also aware of the fact that land the poorest acre of which, according to the latest information from the gentleman, would bring at least $5 an acre might be sold for $1.50 an acre, under the bill brought back from the White House by resolution. I merely call attention to this by way of suggesting how loosely some matters of important legislation are handled, and how little consideration, apparently, or how much consideration, possibly, is given to some matters the fruits of which do not clearly appear in the legislation itself.

If $5 an acre is a proper minimum price, $1.50 an acre is a very improper minimum price. If there are fifty or sixty young Indians, more or less, who ought to be taken care of, it is gross carelessness or inexcusable ignorance that left them out of account in the first legislation. While I did not make objection to the unanimous consent for doctoring up the other bill in a summary way, to hasten it to the President, and if it meets with his approval make it a law in this extraordinary manner, I have no doubt the objection is one that ought to have been made, and such legislative methods ought not to be adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware of the fact, if the gentleman will excuse me, that about fifteen reservations have been opened in the last eight years since I have been a Member of Congress in exactly the same way, and it seems to me the gentleman is late in finding it out.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Well, I am not finding out about the right to legislate, but I am saying that when $5 is a proper minimum price there is need for some explanation why the minimum price of a dollar and a half is fixed. Now, if the gentleman or anybody else doubts that proposition, I shall be very glad to yield to him.

As to the matter criticised by my friend from New York, I take it that the fact about it probably is this: That gentlemen interested in the legislation and maybe doubting whether the Presidential veto or Presidential approval would follow the passage of the measure, busied themselves in finding out the Executive mind, and used what influence they may have had to secure approval. In the course of discussion, anybody would naturally learn it if the Executive did not take the same view as the advocates of a measure, and would ascertain what the objections of the Executive were. Then again it seems to me the action to be criticised is that of the House and Senate, in not leaving the bill to be disposed of, to be vetoed or approved, but calling it back and endeavoring to doctor it up.

As to this measure, it is taking the regular course, the old $1.50 bill being abandoned. It is a bill called up in the regular way, and it is likely to go through by the very bad process of "unanimous consent," and that is a very usual way of doing things here, and a statement of that fact carries no reproach to the gentleman who asks unanimous consent for this bill; but it does show that important matters are disposed of with the slightest of consideration. What extraordinary blunders of ignorance or carelessness or something else may frequently creep into legislation! That is all I care to say about it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the criticism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is well taken. The Constitution of the United States does not prescribe the mode and manner by which the President of the United States shall inform Congress of his views upon public questions, and it has grown up in this country, whether in strict conformity to the Constitution or otherwise, that the President is to all intents and purposes a branch of or a portion of or a factor in the legislative department of the Government. The Constitution provides in little more specific terms than the memory of the gentleman from New York furnished the exact prerogatives of the President in this behalf. "He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union; to recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient." There is no limitation upon the mode and manner, the time, or any other circumstances when he is to communicate to Congress; he may not necessarily send it to either body, and I want to point out to the gentleman that he has lived under a condition much more unsatisfactory to him, no doubt, than the one we are laboring under now in the very worst aspect of it, and of which my friend complains. I remember that Mr. Cleveland was elected President in 1884. He entered public life in a national way at the same time that I did. He had the honor to make his appearance as President at the same time I had the honor to make my appearance in this House. There had been a question in regard to the free and unlimited coinage of silver discussed in the country. My friend from New York may have heard of that question; doubtless he is trying to forget it now. Mr. Cleveland wrote a letter during the winter following his election and while he was not President in any proper sense of the term. He wrote a letter to Hon. A. J. Warner, of Ohio, a Congressman, and who had been reelected, and notified the Democratic party of the country he was irrevocably and eternally and always opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver and all other schemes to debase the currency or injure or impair the credit of the Government. It was one of the brave and manly and patriotic acts of Mr. Cleveland for which the Democratic party nominated him four years later for President, and nominated him four years still later for a third time, and after that he wrote the famous letter "My dear Catchings," in which he told the Democrats of the country and the Democrats of the House of Representatives and of the Senate in an unofficial way that the product of their long winter struggle was a measure of "perfidy and dishonor." I do not remember the exact words, but I will try to find them and put them into the RECORD. That it was a bill of "perfidy and dishonor." So it will be seen that we have had growing up a system by which the Executive, in advance possibly, later on possibly, pending the legislation possibly, has always undertaken to inform Congress what his opinion was.

I do not believe that the veto power of the Constitution was ever intended to be used as a club in the hands of the President, to be used by him as a lobbyist, but I do believe that it was intended always that the President of the United States might communicate his views directly or in the various ways which I have suggested, not alone to Congress by his message, but as well in such manner as he may see fit. I know nothing about this question on this particular bill. It ought to be corrected, certainly, beyond all doubt, and I am willing to trust the gentlemen who have the matter in charge. But what I rose to say was that it is hardly worth while to try to teach the American people just now that it is necessary for the President, in order to express his views, to send a formidable statement, possibly in the way of a formidable document in the shape of a message to Congress.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, the President is an American citizen while he is President, and has a right to write letters to anybody he chooses. Mr. Cleveland had and Mr. Roosevelt has; but that is not very applicable to this particular case after hearing the remarks of my colleague from New York. What are the facts? This bill went to the President. Some gentleman in the House interested in the bill heard that the President was inclined to veto it. They went to see the President, and found out what his views were about the bill. The President did not communicate to the House. He did talk with the gentlemen who went to see him. Then a motion was made here in the House to recall the bill. Now, the House did all that—not the President. If there was anything wrong in it, it was up to any Member of the House to object to having that bill recalled. The bill was recalled. It came back here without a word from the President. While an endeavor was made to fix up the bill by resolution, to amend it most materially in the engrossment of the bill, have it reengrossed and sent to the Senate, and then to the President, I objected to that motion myself. My colleague did not object then.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not have the time; the gentleman from New York was too quick for me.

Mr. PAYNE. I am glad to be ahead of you possibly once in a while. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he did not object to the previous bill amended in that way.

Mr. PAYNE. And it turned out when the statement was made of what the President has done that he did not communicate with the House. It turns out that as the bill was first introduced in the House there were great hardships imposed. Now, they come in here with an original bill, securing at least $5 an acre to these Indians for these lands. That has all resulted in better legislation, by proper methods, and the initiation was entirely in the House, and the President, either under the Constitution or outside of it, has not made any communication to the House whatever, and my colleague should have withheld his comments and his criticism in regard to this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, some things are overlooked by gentlemen on the other side of the House. This bill in its original form was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs in several sessions of Congress. Before it was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs it had been referred to the Indian Office and had been reported on by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the details of the bill approved before the Committee on Indian Affairs unanimously reported it. After the bill went to the President, this same office, which had several times approved of the details of the bill, found, not that Congress, but that the Executive department of the Government had been derelict in its duty. When this was ascertained, the President did not perform his constitutional duty. The Constitution provides in the second clause of section 7, Article I:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House, respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

In some mysterious way, in some way not expressed in the Constitution, some Members became aware of the fact that the President would do what was eminently proper under the conditions disclosed, veto this bill as originally presented to him, and state in a respectful manner his reasons for so doing. Had that been done the Congress would have had an opportunity to exercise its constitutional powers and determine whether, in spite of the President's objections, the bill should be enacted into law by the concurrence of two-thirds of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives. The Congress has been in this instance, and in other instances, deprived of this constitutional right by resort to the extraordinary procedure already mentioned.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio, with his ability to excuse and defend, goes back to the last Democratic Administration. It has been my observation that where no better excuse can be given for the action of the Republican party in this Congress, appeal is made to the record made by the Democratic party. If necessary they condemn it; if essential to their purpose, they approve it; but for everything good, bad, or indifferent that is proposed in Congress to-day, authority seems to be found in the last Democratic Administration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I said nothing about the Democratic party in what I had the honor to submit. I spoke about Mr. Cleveland. Do you recognize him as the Democratic party?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; he was a part of the Democratic party, and he was elected as a Democrat.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He acted in his individual capacity as President.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In all of his communications to Members of Congress, when he was President, in my judgment, he acted as President, not as a private individual; and my criticism of the practice that has not only grown up but is being accentuated, is the important part the Executive is taking in the legislative business of the Government.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it was only the day before yesterday that an amendment to a bill pending in the Senate was prepared and framed in the White House, and sent into the Senate to be incorporated into the bill.

Mr. GREENE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GREENE. Did you not notice in the debate that was had in the Senate yesterday that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] denied that it was prepared in the White House?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, if it be proper to refer to what occurred in the Senate, the Senator from Kansas stated with great particularity that it had not been prepared, "prepared," in the White House; just like many bills that come into this House that are not prepared by Members, but they are submitted here for consideration. But while a bill is pending in the legislative branch of the Government, amendments are prepared, debated, and perfected, not in the legislative branch of the Government, but in the executive branch of the Government. It would be better for orderly and proper procedure if the Constitution were amended, and the Congress made to consist of three houses instead of two as now provided. As a matter of fact, to-day much important legislation originates, is discussed and perfected in a branch of the legislature unknown to the law—that is, in the White House.

Some may say that these objections are trivial. The history of all nations, which contained parliamentary bodies, discloses that all encroachments on the rights of the parliamentary bodies by the sovereign or the executive are trivial in the beginning. The failure to resent such encroachments has encouraged great and more important grasps for power, with the inevitable resentment and strife.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have not heard all of the debate on this bill, but came into the House as the gentleman from Missouri was criticising the committee for having reported it as it was reported formerly and as it passed the House. I want to say that the bill which passed the House some time ago was very carefully considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and in passing I may say that the Committee on Indian Affairs does not report any of these bills until they have had the most full and careful consideration. There is nothing remarkable about the fact that this bill passed the House without containing the two provisions that caused objection to be made to it, as I understand it, in the Department, or at the White House. The bill limited the price that the lands might be sold for—that is, the minimum price—at not less than $1.50 per acre; but there is a provision that they shall be sold at public auction, or upon sealed bids, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, to the highest bidder, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, and it does not matter whether there is a minimum price fixed or not. It is presumed that the Secretary of the Interior would not permit the lands to be sold at less than what they are worth. One of the reasons for not fixing a higher minimum price was because some of these lands may be very poor and possibly could not be sold for $5 an acre, or $4 an acre, or $3 an acre, and it might require additional legislation at some time in the future to clean up this transaction and dispose of all the lands that this bill proposes shall be disposed of.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The fifth section of this bill states that after the expiration of five years all land remaining undisposed of shall be sold without reference to the price.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I believe there is some such provision in the bill, but it does not say "without reference to the price." Now, as to the question of allotment to the children born since June 6, 1900, the lands belonging to the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians were disposed of some years ago under a treaty, and the Government paid for them, but reserved for pasturage purposes what it is now proposed to sell by this bill, namely, 480,000 acres, and in addition 25,000 acres set aside as a wood reservation. Allotments had been made to all of the Indians and the committee did not consider that those born in the last two years were entitled to allotments, but concluded that all the land ought to be sold and that the money received therefor should go into the Treasury for the benefit of all the Indians.

I simply make these observations to resent the imputation that this bill was carelessly or negligently considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs and reported to this House. A similar bill was reported in the last Congress. This bill passed this House and no objection was offered from any source to its passage. It also passed the Senate, and after it had gone to the White House I understand that the Indian Department, that had not passed on the bill, or made any report thereon, raised certain objections which came to the notice of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], and that he initiated the proceedings by which the resolution was adopted by the House and Senate asking the President to return the bill. I say there was nothing unusual or remarkable about the procedure.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman if he will not yield for a matter on the Speaker's table.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think I have been pretty patient this morning. How long will it take?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not very long. The reason I did not call the attention of the Chair to it was that I understood that the Chair wanted to take up some matters for unanimous consent first.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will yield.

TERMS OF CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS IN ALABAMA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following Senate bill, a similar House bill being on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (S. 5215) to fix the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama shall be held at the city of Birmingham, in the county of Jefferson, twice in each year, on the first Mondays in March and September, and that said courts shall remain in open session for the transaction of business at least six months in each calendar year.

SEC. 2. That whenever the judge for the northern district of Alabama deems it advisable, on account of disability or absence, or of the accumulation of business therein, or for any other cause, that said court should be held by the justice of some other district or circuit court, he shall, in writing, request the presiding justice for the fifth judicial circuit of the United States to assign a judge to hold the term or terms of said court.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, is this bill submitted for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. No; it is a Senate bill, a similar House bill having been reported and on the Calendar.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly to be obliged to antagonize any bill introduced by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to his colleague?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Only a few minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say to the House and to my colleague from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who knows that I entertain for him sentiments of the warmest personal esteem, that it gives me no small embarrassment to be put in the attitude of opposing any measure of legislation in which he feels an interest, but this bill is one that vitally affects the Federal judicial district in which I reside. The judge opposes it as unfair to him. Members of the bar all over the district are importunate in their demands that I do not consent to its passage. Let me state the case briefly. There are three judicial districts in Alabama, over which two judges preside. The southern district is composed, according to my recollection, of thirteen counties, over which Judge Toulmin presides. He lives at Mobile. The middle and northern districts, altogether consisting of some fifty-odd counties, constitute the balance of the State, and are presided over by Judge Thomas G. Jones, whose domicile is in the city of Montgomery—my home town. In these two districts—the middle and northern—there are five places at which Federal courts are held, to wit: Montgomery, Tuscaloosa, Anniston, Birmingham, and Huntsville. The bill under consideration proposes that the judge of these two districts shall hold court at Birmingham six months out of every year, leaving for the other four places, including the capital, in the aggregate as the time for holding court the remaining six months, and, of course, affording the judge no recess or recreation. The bill makes it mandatory that six months out of every twelve shall be devoted to Birmingham, regardless of the rights and interests of litigants in the other towns I have named, and irrespective of the convenience of the public in other communities of our State. This manifestly is unfair. For these reasons, strong opposition has developed, and I am urged to resist the bill now under consideration.

Certainly it will operate most unjustly to the people of the district I have the honor to represent and in which I reside, if the bill becomes a law. There has been no consultation on the part of the Alabama delegation as to its merits. I knew nothing of it until after it had received a favorable report from the Judiciary Committee. My colleague [Mr. CLAYTON], who also resides in the middle judicial district, is absent, nor was he here when the bill was so reported; and, so far as I know, he has never been consulted on this proposition. Certain it is, that my wishes were never sought to be known nor have been respected.

Now, under the circumstances, I ask my colleague to give us, the Alabama delegation, an opportunity to come together, to ascertain, if possible, whether we can not agree on something reasonable, just, and fair. That is all I have to say. I repeat, I regret exceedingly to be put, even remotely, in the position of opposing anything that my friend from Alabama asks at the hands of this House. I have done.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER], the chairman of the subcommittee who reported the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I should be glad to ask my colleague some questions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. After I have yielded to the gentleman from New York I will answer the gentleman's questions.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, this bill was carefully considered and unanimously reported by the Judiciary Committee, because it will, we hope, obviate the necessity of appointing an additional United States judge in the northern district of Alabama. The court is now held at Birmingham at different times for three months in each year. The bill pending simply requires that it be continued three months longer, or six months in all, provided business keeps it employed for that length of time. It will not, in my opinion, interfere with terms of court at other places where they are fixed, but it will relieve the congestion of business at Birmingham, which is great and which needs relief. There were 780 criminal and civil cases pending in the northern and middle districts of Alabama on July 1, 1905, and the larger part of them, I am informed, originated at Birmingham and vicinity. This bill is the result of the best thought of the Judiciary Committee as a means of giving the needed relief. Business at other places is not congested, and the giving of Birmingham a court for six months will, in our opinion, leave sufficient time to dispose of business at other places where courts are now held under the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that my colleague the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] desires to ask some questions.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask this question: Do the terms of the bill under consideration interfere with the length of the terms of the court allowed, for instance, at Huntsville, Ala.?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The terms of this bill do not interfere with any court except the court at Birmingham. It says nothing about any court. It merely provides that if Judge Jones can not hold our court he shall call on the circuit judges and ask them to send somebody else to hold the court.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Can not he do that under the present statute?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but this makes it mandatory that he shall do it. Now, I will say to the House that the whole effect of this bill is simply this: We have one judge who presides over the northern and middle districts of Alabama. The middle district of Alabama is in the southeast corner of the State. The northern district embraces the entire north half of the State, and the southern district is in the southwest corner of the State. We have a judge of the southern district and a judge of the middle district, both in southern Alabama. We tried to get a judge for the northern district of Alabama, where the great bulk of the business is. The Judiciary Committee said that two judges were enough in Alabama. The bill for a new judge was referred to the Attorney-General, and he said that the business was not properly divided, that the judge for the northern and middle districts had more work than he ought to do and could do, but that if the business was properly divided two judges could attend to all there was in Alabama. Now, we tried then when we could not get another judge to redistrict the State, and it was impossible in our delegation from Alabama in the committee or among the judges to agree on a bill for the redistricting of this State, both judges living in southern part of Alabama and neither of them being willing to move away from his home. The judge of the northern district says it would take him seventeen months a year to hold terms of court in this district and give the attention that is needed. It is conceded that 65 per cent of the business in these two districts, in the middle district and the northern district, is in Birmingham. That composes 65 per cent of the business of the two districts.

Well, the situation in this: A large number of railroads center in Birmingham. The court has become congested. Every railroad case that is brought in this district is removed from the State courts and landed in the United States courts, because every railroad is a nonresident corporation. Every other big nonresident corporation against which a suit is brought and which it does not want to try is landed in the United States courts by being removed from State courts, and the result is that there is an absolute denial of justice. As stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER], the facts show that there is no court in the United States, except the southern district of New York, where there is a greater congestion of business. That being the case, the question is how to relieve the situation and let the people get a trial of their cases. There is only one way. The Committee on the Judiciary says that we can not have another judge. It is impossible to redistrict the State, because both judges live down in south Alabama, and the only proposition that we now fall back on is this legislation, that we shall have three months more court at Birmingham to attempt to relieve this congestion of the business and provide that when the judge who presides over that district is unable to go there and hold the court himself he shall certify that fact to the circuit judges of the fifth judicial circuit, and if they can get a man they shall assign him to go to Birmingham and try the cases. It does not cost the Government a nickel. It does not create a new office. It merely provides that it shall be the mandatory duty of the judge if he can not hold this court himself within the time designated by the law to notify the circuit judges, and they shall assign another judge, if they can get one to go and hold that court.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama pardon an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. The gentleman states that it will not cost the Government a nickel to hold these courts. Does the gentleman not know that under the law if any other judge besides Judge Jones holds a court at Birmingham the expenses to himself and his secretary, the expenses not to exceed $10 a day, will be charged against the Government?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; but that is the law now.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. But the gentleman says it will not cost the Government a nickel.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say this bill will not cost the Government a nickel. That is the law now. The law is now when a judge is sent out of his district that his expenses are paid.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. If Judge Jones holds court in Birmingham nothing is allowed to him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly not; but if he can not hold the court there we are entitled to, and all we are asking is that somebody else be sent to hold that court, and, of course, he would get his expenses, as the general law provides.

I will append, as a part of my remarks, the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16802) to fix the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, and for other purposes, have had the same under consideration and report it back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it pass.

The object of the bill is to extend the time for holding the United States courts at the city of Birmingham, Ala., where it is shown that the dockets are overcrowded and that it is impossible to dispose of the business in the terms now prescribed by law.

The State of Alabama is divided into three districts, which are called the southern, middle, and northern districts of Alabama. There are sixty-six counties in Alabama. The southern district includes the counties of Mobile, Washington, Baldwin, Sumter, Clark, Marengo, Dallas, Green, Perry, Pickens, Wilcox, Monroe, and Conecuh—13 in all.

The middle district includes the counties of Montgomery, Autauga, Coosa, Tallapoosa, Chambers, Talladega, Randolph, Macon, Russell, Barbour, Pike, Henry, Dale, Coffee, Covington, Lowndes, and Butler—17 in all.

The northern district includes the remaining counties in the State—36 in all.

There are two district judges appointed for Alabama; one presides over the southern district and resides at Mobile, and the other presides over the northern and middle districts and resides at Montgomery. There is only one court held in the middle district and that is at Montgomery, while in the northern district the law provides for holding court at Huntsville, Anniston, Tuscaloosa, and Birmingham.

The business pending in the courts of the northern and middle districts of Alabama is as follows:

From the foregoing statement it is readily seen that more than half of the business of all the courts in the northern and middle districts of Alabama is now pending on the dockets of the courts for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama at Birmingham.

The testimony before the Judiciary Committee shows that Birmingham is in the center of the mining and manufacturing district of Alabama, and is the largest railroad center in the State; that there is a vast amount of litigation at this point, and the dockets of the United States courts are overcrowded; that under present conditions it takes four or five years after it is filed to reach a civil case for trial, which amounts to almost a denial of justice; most of the time is occupied in trying the criminal cases.

The report of the Attorney-General for the United States for last year shows that the business in the courts of the northern and middle districts of Alabama is greater in amount than that on the dockets of any district or districts in the United States over which a single judge is called upon to preside, except that of the southern district of New York.

There is no doubt that to accomplish the ends of justice some form of relief is needed at Birmingham, and it is believed that this bill, by providing for six months of court, will relieve the situation without great cost to the Government.

There are a number of precedents for fixing the length of the terms of court, one of the most recent being that of the western district of New York, where it is expressly provided that court shall be held in the city of Buffalo at least two weeks in each month of the year except August. (Act of May 12, 1900, 31 Stat., 176.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. One moment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield for a question to my colleague.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, before my colleague moves the previous question I ask permission to have the Clerk read a statement from Judge Jones, printed in a recent issue of the Montgomery Advertiser, for the information and benefit of the House, and as part of my remarks. It states fully and accurately the reasons why the bill should not pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, you misapprehend my request. I stated I wished that this newspaper article, or interview, may be read for the information and benefit of the House. That was my request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yielded to my colleague once, but——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is unanimous consent required for the reading of that newspaper article?

The SPEAKER. Well, if the gentleman yields he can yield in his own time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yielded on the understanding the gentleman would require about five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman insists upon his understanding, I will move the previous question.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. One moment, Mr. Speaker; my colleague from Alabama consented that this should be done. It simply puts Judge Jones's views before the House, and I ask unanimous consent that the article may be read. It is only fair to him. The bill has come up unexpectedly, and as the statement is from a judge who is interested in this matter it is but fair the House should hear what he has to say.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Alabama do?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to let the gentleman put in the article.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. It is not only for the information and benefit of the House, but for the information and benefit of the people I have the honor to represent in this Chamber—my constituents at home.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What is this about?

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. It is a letter from Judge Jones, who is affected by this bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is it about this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is, and I yielded for the purpose of having it read.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I will not insist upon the point.

The Clerk read as follows:

OPPOSED TO BILL—JUDGE JONES TALKS OF UNDERWOOD MEASURE—MONTGOMERY LAWYERS WILL MEET TO-MORROW TO EXPRESS DISAPPROVAL OF THE PROPOSED FEDERAL COURT ACT.

Strong opposition has developed among the members of the local bar and other members of the legal profession in different parts of Alabama over the United States court bill recently introduced in Congress by Representative UNDERWOOD.

This bill provides for the fixing of regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, in Birmingham, and also for the power of the judge for the northern district to request the assignment of another judge to hold court in that district when, for any reason, he deems it necessary.

Owing to the widespread dissatisfaction that has been evinced in regard to this matter, an interview was obtained by the Advertiser from United States Judge Thomas G. Jones on this bill yesterday.

"Judge Jones," said a representative of the Advertiser, "the bar here, it is understood, will meet Monday to oppose the United States court bill recently offered by Representative UNDERWOOD. It is said that both you and Judge Toulmin are opposed to it. It is a matter of much public interest in both the districts. Do you mind stating your views?"

"I couldn't discuss criticisms of a judicial decision with propriety, but in a matter of this sort I am glad to give my views, especially as I had no opportunity to do so before the Judiciary Committee of the House," replied Judge Jones. He then furnished a copy of the bill, which is as follows:

"To fix the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama shall be held at the city of Birmingham, in the county of Jefferson, twice in each year, on the first Mondays in March and September, and that said courts shall remain in open session for the transaction of business at least six months in each calendar year.

"SEC. 2. That whenever the judge for the northern district of Alabama deems it advisable, on account of disability or absence, or of the accumulation of business therein, or for any other cause, that said court should be held by the justice of some other district or circuit court, he shall, in writing, request the presiding justice for the fifth judicial circuit of the United States to assign a judge to hold the term or terms of said court."

"This bill," Judge Jones continued, "does not give any more judicial force than now, and it does not promote in any way whatever a more certain supply of outside judges than we already have under the existing law. The law now provides explicitly that whenever there is an 'accumulation of business' in any district the circuit judge shall designate some judge of another district to aid.

"The law has already been availed of. Judge Toulmin has already been designated, generally, to hold courts in the northern district, and has held courts at Anniston and Birmingham, as I have at the latter place, twice a year. Judge Toulmin is now holding court at Birmingham, under that designation. Judge Boarman has also been designated and agreed to hold the April term at Huntsville. Judge Shelby has held a term there. I am holding court here, where the common-law docket needs attention, with the equity and some important criminal cases left untried. From here I go to Tuscaloosa, and thence, about May 1, to hold a long term of the civil docket at Birmingham. What more can be done than is being done for Birmingham or the northern district unless Congress should give us another permanent judge, as the lawyers asked, either for the middle and northern districts or a separate judge for the northern district? I have certainly done all the asking for aid under the old law that I could under the new law. Judge Toulmin or no other judge could do any more under a designation under the new law than he could or would under the old. The only other judges I know of who are not crowded in their home districts are Judges Boarman and Swayne. Judge Swayne could not come to Birmingham because of his health, and Judge Boarman, I believe, has calls for all of his spare time. I would be glad if the supporters of this bill would help Judge Shelby or me find some other judges than those named who can be designated to help in the northern district. We have not been able to find such judges. How can we do it under a new law which differs in this particular not one particle from the old law?

"The injustice of the bill is contained in the only real change it makes in existing law, to wit, that the courts at Birmingham 'shall remain in open session for the transaction of business six months in each calendar year.' This means that a judge shall be on the bench in that court six months each year. The court, under the existing law, is already always 'open' for most orders in equity and bankruptcy. How will this provision work in practice? How is it meant to work?

"Look at the situation a little. The one judge of the northern and middle district—that is, Judge Jones—under the law, not in anywise changed by the bill, is required to hold court twice a year at Montgomery, Anniston, Birmingham, Tuscaloosa, and Huntsville. It requires about seven months' work on the bench to keep up with the business of the twenty-four counties in the middle district at Montgomery. Sessions of court are required for at least a month at Tuscaloosa, for about a month and a half at Anniston, and at least two months at Huntsville each year. This is a very conservative estimate of the time required. It will in all probability require more. This gives the judge, not counting time lost in going to and returning from court, eleven and a half months on the bench each year, leaving Birmingham out of the calculation. With six months of court there 'kept in open session' this will put upon one judge seventeen and a half months of judicial labor each year!

"Of course it will be said, 'Nobody expects you to do all that work. It is impossible—you must get help by calling others in.' If I should succeed in getting six months' help from outside judges in the northern district, and thus keep in 'open session' the court at Birmingham, there would still remain to me eleven and a half months on the bench in other places in the two districts, or there and in Birmingham, each year. No human being can stand the strain of holding court eleven and a half months in the year. It could leave no time for any vacation, however short, and practically none for study and investigation and necessary correspondence. The Alabama bar and people, and certainly the American Congress, will not wish a judge of one of the courts treated as a mere beast of burden, to be driven until he falls.

"Suppose, however, the judge of the two district courts does not get as much as six months' outside help, what is he to do? That has happened in the past, and it will in the future. Then the judge must take six months of 'open court' for Birmingham from the time requisite for the other places—Montgomery, Anniston, Huntsville, and Tuscaloosa. I will not elaborate. Everybody can see the workings of the bill, which is new in this one feature only.

"Every lawyer, and certainly every Federal judge in Alabama, sees the need for more judicial force in these two districts and for more time at Birmingham. The number of criminal, common-law, and equity cases in the two districts is 975 cases a year, besides about 1,000 bankruptcy cases a year, with the volume of litigation therefrom which presses on the judge. Everybody, especially every lawyer, who thinks a moment as to the days of judicial labor required to transact all this business, knows the pressing necessity for more judicial force.

"I certainly will do anything in reason to help the Birmingham court. I brought the matter to the attention of the State Bar Association, and it recommended an additional judge for both districts. I told the bar there that it was a matter of personal indifference to me whether there was an additional judge for both districts or a separate judge for the northern district. I went to Washington to appear before the Judiciary Committee in support of that bill, but was prevented from appearing that day by a threatened attack of pneumonia. I think everybody knows that the Alabama delegation united had sufficient influence, with the case we had, to have gotten the permanent additional aid the bar and people asked for. The reasons why they were not united it may not be proper for me to discuss. I am speaking of it now only as a thing of the past, not criticising it.

"As we could not get the relief so urgently needed, we ought not to try, without any increase of judicial force, to supply a remedy for the benefit of one place only in the two districts, which works hardly on other localities and bars, and upon judges who have earnestly and laboriously tried to do everything that mortal man could do to dispatch the business of the two districts. It is known to most lawyers in the two districts that I have never lost a day from sickness or taken a vacation from the bench in nearly five years. They all know that my office is often overwhelmed with correspondence; that I am often in my office by 6 in the morning, and frequently as late as 1 at night, and that for the accommodation of lawyers and litigants. I have heard in the last few years hundreds of cases at night, and frequently even at my home. I feel that I can say, therefore, without a tinge of undue thought of self, that the present bill is unjust."

Mr UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I think that letter fairly demonstrates the necessity of relief in this matter, as the committee, in its wisdom, has determined we can not have another judge, and I now move the previous question.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOAR). The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WILEY of Alabama) there were—ayes 47, noes 18.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask, so as not to interfere with the business of the House to-day, if I can get unanimous consent, that this may go over as unfinished business, to be taken up after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning, the previous question having been ordered to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw his point of order?

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. I withdraw the point of order and will let it go over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the matter will go over as unfinished business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The understanding is it goes over to come up the first thing after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

NEW JUDICIAL DIVISION IN IOWA.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 16014, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16014) to amend an act entitled "An act to create the southern division of the southern district of Iowa for judicial purposes, and to fix the time and place for holding court therein," approved June 1, 1900, and all acts amendatory thereof.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act to create the southern division of the southern district of Iowa for judicial purposes, and to fix the time and place for holding court therein," approved June 1, 1900, and all acts amendatory thereof, be amended to read as follows: "That the counties of Lucas, Clarke, Union, Adair, Adams, Fremont, Page, Taylor, Ringgold, Decatur, and Wayne shall constitute the southern division of the southern judicial district of Iowa; and a term of a circuit and district court for said district shall be held in said division hereby created at Creston, in Union County, on the fourth Tuesday in March and first Tuesday in November of each and every year."

SEC. 2. That all causes now pending in the southern division of the southern judicial district from Appanoose County shall be transferred to the eastern division of the southern judicial district of Iowa, at Keokuk, in Lee County.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. I shall not seek at this time to limit the time of general debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16953, and pending that motion the gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time be equally divided—one-half to be controlled by him and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16953—the post-office appropriation bill—Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of an appropriation bill to be reported by its title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16953) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the rapid growth of the postal service makes necessary very heavy appropriations to maintain that service. What may appear to be extraordinarily large figures for appropriations for the service are not extraordinarily large when analyzed and found to be required to pay for the proper and efficient maintenance of this system. The decade just closing, perhaps, reflects more nearly than any other decade in our nation's history the growth of commercial enterprise in this country. No feature of our Government or business of the nation demonstrates more clearly than the postal service the growth of the business of the country; and when it is found that the expenditures for this great service, as well as the receipts from it, have practically doubled within the last ten years, it can easily be seen how rapidly the business of the country has developed.

The bill which is now before the committee carries $191,373,848.75, an increase over the amount carried by the law for the present fiscal year equal to $10,351,755. This increase of over $10,000,000 is not any evidence of extravagance or looseness in the management of postal affairs, but rather demonstrates the increase in the business of the country reflected in the postal system, reaching practically every family among our 80,000,000 people.

The committee on framing this bill has sought with great care and patience to carefully analyze and correct where it might the various estimates made by the Department covering the general features of the postal system. The regular estimate of the Department, which came in the ordinary way through the Secretary of the Treasury, aggregated $193,210,070. Modified estimates, made subsequently to the first estimate of the Department, reduced this amount, so that the total estimate by the Department in the last amount submitted was $192,287,070. The amount recommended by the Post-Office Committee in this bill is less than the first estimate by $1,836,221.25 and less than the modified estimate of the Department by $913,221.25.

While the committee, Mr. Chairman, has reduced in its recommendations the estimates of the Department by practically $1,000,000 this year, we have made proper and full provision for the efficiency of the service so far as possibly can be made and prevent any extravagance or unwise expenditure. While this bill necessarily covers every State and Territory of the Union and the possessions of the United States except the Philippines, reaching, as it does, every family, it necessarily contains a great many items of appropriation. Nevertheless seven item of the bill carry 87.8 per cent of the entire appropriation, leaving to all of the other items for the service 12.2 per cent of the total provided for in the bill. The deficit for the fiscal year 1905, or the difference between the receipts and the expenditures for the service, amounted to $14,572,584.13. Yet, while the deficit for the last fiscal year, ending the 30th of last June, was more than fourteen and a half millions of dollars, nevertheless the receipts for the fiscal year 1905 exceeded the expenditures of the preceding fiscal year by $464,468.40. It would seem, therefore, that notwithstanding the tremendous growth of the business of the country, necessitating a corresponding tremendous increase in appropriations for this postal service, the receipts of the service are increasing almost as rapidly as the expenses. Notwithstanding these expenses necessitate increases for additional facilities, including the heavy appropriations for rural service, yet the receipts for the year 1905 were greater than the expenditures for the year 1904 by $464,468.40.

I suggested a moment ago that while the total carried by the bill aggregated in excess of $191,000,000, seven of the items of the bill accounted for 87.8 per cent of the entire total. These seven items are the following: Transportation by railroad companies, including postal cars; letter carriers of the rural free-delivery service; compensation to postmasters; clerks of the first and second class offices; letter carriers in the city delivery service; clerks in the Railway Mail Service, and the transportation by star routes.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. What is the increase for the railroad mail over last year?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The total increase for railroad transportation over the fiscal year 1906 is $2,100,000, or 5.13 per cent.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. And what is the increase in the railroad postal cars for the same period?

Mr. OVERSTREET. We make no increase in the appropriation for postal cars. It is the same appropriation as last year.

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to learn that within a short time so many of these same items which I have just enumerated have increased by practically a hundred per cent, and notwithstanding so heavy an increase the expenditures are absolutely necessary for the proper and efficient maintenance of the service. Counting the period that is represented by the bill under consideration, and assuming that the appropriations for these seven items should be made into law and expended, it shows that the expenditures for railway mail transportation have doubled since the year 1892, the expenditures for rural delivery service have doubled since the year 1904, that the compensation to postmasters has doubled since the year 1887, that the compensation to clerks in first and second class offices has doubled since the year 1899, that the compensation to letter carriers in city delivery service has doubled since 1894, and the compensation for the Railway Mail Service has doubled since the year 1896. The star service has not shown that increase, because there have been many changes incident to the extension of rural delivery, and the amount for star service has only increased about $2,000,000 since 1882. The method pursued by the committee on arriving at the sums necessary for the maintenance of the service is to examine the statute law, which is the basis for the service, and make the estimates in accordance with the necessities, as shown by the best proof which it can secure.

Mr. SIBLEY. I think the gentleman misspoke, possibly, or was misunderstood here by some, when he stated that the railway-mail pay has doubled since 1894. In 1894 it was $38,000,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I may be in error on that. These figures were copied this morning by a typewriter, and it may be possible that there is a mistake. I will examine carefully, and if I am in error I will correct it. I think I said since 1892.

Taking at the start the amount necessary for railroad transportation, the statute to-day is the same statute which has been in force since 1873, as modified by amendment by two statutes since that date. Under the law the rate of railway mail pay is fixed, and the method of ascertaining the weight, which is the basis of the rate, is also fixed by statute. For the purpose of convenience of administration the country is divided into four territorial divisions. Each of those divisions is administered separate from the other three, and the mail within each of those divisions is weighed once in four years, and that weight, under the law, becomes the basis for the calculation of the total pay. It is apparent, therefore, that the statute fixes practically the amount of pay for railroad transportation based upon the quantity of mail carried in each of these four several divisions, and that all the committee is called upon to do is to make the proper calculations and to recommend to the House such appropriation as those calculations shall carry out. The amount for railway mail pay of these four several divisions on the 30th day of last June was $39,833,070. In other words, that was the annual rate for the four divisions on the 30th of June last; but each year a weighing period occurs in one of the four divisions. This year this division is what is known as the "fourth division," west of the Missouri River excepting two States. The weighing is in progress there at this time. It is estimated by the Department, basing those estimates purely upon experience, that there will probably be an increase in the fourth division of 15 per cent, although it is more likely to approach 17 per cent. Therefore, the only calculation made in order to estimate the amount necessary to make payment for railway mail transportation during the next fiscal year is to take the amount fixed already in three of the divisions, and then add 15 per cent to the amount fixed in the fourth division, and thereby we arrive at the amount which we recommend in the bill.

In the rural delivery service the calculation is made upon the total number of carriers already in the service, at the salaries which they are now paid, plus the estimate of the number of routes which will probably be installed during the next fiscal year. The pay of rural carriers as to rate per year is fixed by the statute, so far as the maximum pay is concerned, and that amount can be absolutely and accurately calculated by the Department. There were in the service on the 1st day of March, 1906, 35,031 rural carriers. The amounts of pay, therefore, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, for those carriers can be estimated accurately. There were pending on the same date, March 1, 1906, 3,130 petitions undetermined. Estimating the usual number of petitions which are rejected, or, rather, the usual per cent of rejection, and calculating the number of petitions which may probably, in view of past experience, be filed during the remainder of the current fiscal year, and also during the next fiscal year, we arrive at approximately the amount necessary for new service for rural delivery. Therefore we add these two estimates together and reach the amount which we put in the bill, which this year calls for $28,200,000.

Mr. Chairman, not only will this $28,200,000 care for every rural carrier now in the service, but will include the amount necessary for new service during the fiscal year 1907, or a little more than was carried for the current fiscal year. Instead, therefore, of our having cut the appropriation for rural service, we have recommended for the next fiscal year a few hundred dollars more than we appropriated for the current fiscal year for new service. In that way we have made ample provision for the rural service.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the progress which has thus far been made in this branch of the postal service.

The appropriations for rural service for 1904 exceeded the appropriations for 1903 by 71.42 per cent. The increase for the year 1905 over the year 1904 was 68.16 per cent. The increase for the year 1906 over the year 1905 was 24.47 per cent. The increase recommended by this bill for the fiscal year 1907 over the fiscal year 1906 is 12.26 per cent.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question now?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly not.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask whether that represents the growth that is anticipated for the future, or does it show that we have come pretty nearly up to meeting the requirements of the country?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The figures unquestionably show that we have been making rapid progress in extensions, and have come fairly well up to the requirements of the country. In other words, a large portion of the populous sections of the country have already been provided with this service, and the fact that we are appropriating now more money than the Department has recommended for this service indicates that we are going to be able to make ample provision for all the sections that really appreciate the service and where it can be of any importance.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That branch of the service is being run without a deficit?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not without a deficit as compared with the receipts from the service, with the expenditure for the service.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The service has not expended money beyond that appropriated for it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Money has been turned back into the Treasury. During the present year more than a half million dollars will be turned back into the Treasury, and in the fiscal year 1907 there will be unexpended much more. My guess is, based on my judgment, that this service is already being extended wherever there is a genuine appreciation for it, and that of the appropriations carried in this bill certainly a million dollars will be covered back into the Treasury at the end of the fiscal year 1907.

I have no hesitancy in joining my colleagues on this committee in this recommendation, for the reason that this sum is not set apart out of the funds in the Treasury; it is only authorized, and if it is not used no harm will follow.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. On that subject, if it will not interrupt the gentleman, I want to ask if there has been any consideration given by the Post-Office Committee to the suggestions that have been made from time to time that the rural carriers and the vehicles of carriers be so equipped with signal flags as to give the weather reports to the rural communities as they pass through.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No consideration by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has been given to it. It was not called to our attention. Without having taken the time to look into it, I should say that there was nothing to violate the powers of the two Departments, the Agricultural and the Post-Office Departments, by putting such a practice as that into operation without legislation.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I simply wish to suggest it as advisable. There is a very general demand through the country traversed by the rural carriers for the service of the Weather Bureau—to have the flags and signs put upon these wagons, which would have the effect of enlightening the people of the territory traversed. Notice of approaching changes might have the effect of saving entire crops from destruction.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman if there was any consideration by the committee as to increasing the pay of the city carriers in the cities where the population is between 10,000 and 20,000, and increasing the pay of the rural carriers?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There was no consideration given by the committee with reference to either one of those subjects. When I say no consideration, I mean no special effort to go into that subject at all. The subject of increase of salaries, either for the rural carriers or the city carriers or for the clerks or the railway mail clerks is one that involves such heavy expenditure that the committee has felt, without making any permanent decision upon it, that this is not an opportune time to take up either one of those matters. Therefore we make no recommendation in this bill, but have not foreclosed against any of these propositions, or any increase of salaries at all. We have, however, recommended some increase of salaries of the lower grades of post-office clerks.

I think myself, in view of the question put by the gentleman from Michigan, that it might be well to say at this point that on account of the necessities of the service requiring such heavy expenditure, and the fact that we can not see our way clear, certainly within a number of years in the future, to avoid heavy deficits, that we must certainly for a time avoid increasing generally the salaries of carriers, either rural or city, and clerks and railway mail clerks.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Does not the gentleman think the carriers are as much entitled to an increase as the railways for carrying the mail?

Mr. OVERSTREET. We have not increased the pay of the railroads by a single penny; we must increase the amount as the quantity of mail is increased upon them. You take the city carrier, for example, and the amount of mail which he carries on each of his trips varies very little from time to time, except at the emergency periods and the holidays.

It is no proper comparison, and I think the gentleman would himself admit it, to make that kind of an inquiry, because neither one of them can be compared with the other. The city letter carriers are paid a straight salary for a fixed line of work, and the amount of work which they do does not vary from day to day excepting in holiday seasons. We have provided for a large number of city letter carriers, rural carriers, post-office clerks, and railway mail clerks, because of the increase of the postal business, but we provide for the pay of railroads in accordance with the amount of weight which they carry. The two can not be compared.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that the committee has provided for an increase in the salaries of clerks in first and second class post-offices—that is, in those grades from $600 up to and including $1,100, is it not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. By giving them each $100 increase. Now, in reference to the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] as to the weather reports, does the gentleman understand that that would require any legislation? I do not.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I stated to the gentleman from Michigan that in my judgment, without having gone into the subject carefully, it would not require legislation. I think it is a matter of administration which could be provided for between the Department of Agriculture and the Post-Office Department.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, it is very clear to me that it does not require legislation if the Post-Office Department will take cognizance of its merit and desirability, but sometimes it is a good thing to prompt them by legislation.

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I am of opinion that the insistence of Members of Congress would bring that about when certainly legislation is not needed.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Indiana will permit——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I can say that the Chief of the Weather Bureau and the Secretary of Agriculture are both willing to extend this service, and if the Post-Office Department is willing to unite with them in doing that work, it can be done without legislation.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I would like to interrogate the gentleman from Connecticut a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The willingness of the Agricultural Bureau to comply with a request of this character indicates that they have had the matter up.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. In the hearings we have had, Mr. Moore, Chief of the Weather Bureau, has referred to it and is willing to do that work.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. These are the hearings before the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question, if he will permit, and the gentleman from Indiana will yield.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin to ask a question of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Do not make the question too technical on this subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he would also urge the rural carriers having on their wagons the quotations of the markets?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No; I do not think that would be a desirable experiment. I do not want to treat the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin factiously, but the difference between the proposition I have advanced and the suggestion he makes is this: One is a scientific report that the Government takes charge of and distributes; the other is a purely speculative proposition, which fluctuates with the dispositions of men, and I do not think they belong in the same category at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. The information, so far as the Weather Bureau is concerned, is contained also in the daily papers, which the gentleman says the farmers have access to in ascertaining the quotations of market products.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why is not the same service extended by the daily press, rather than by labeling the rural mail wagons with posters of weather predictions?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Men do not make the weather, although the present Chief of the Weather Bureau comes nearer accomplishing this impossible task than any man has ever done before him.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; not even the Weather Bureau does that.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I have seen Weather Bureau predictions that have not been realized at all, but the basis upon which the weather reports are gathered and made are extremely creditable to the Government, and mark with considerable accuracy advance information regarding the changes in temperature. Signals can be displayed and easily seen on the top of a mail wagon going through the country. It is proper information. It may appropriately be given. But market reports are usually fluctuating figures of chance.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is an administrative matter. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Indiana to say a little while ago there had been considerable increase in the amount of appropriation for the pay of carriers and clerks. That was occasioned by the increase in the number of carriers and clerks and not an increase in individual clerks.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Entirely so, and I expect to call the attention of the committee to an increase for promotion purposes of the lower-grade clerks, but for carriers and all clerks except low grades the increase is entirely due to the increased number required by the increased volume of business.

Mr. OLCOTT. Thank you.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he has any idea as to the cost of this service?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will appreciate that this matter is entirely an administrative matter. It is not provided for in the bill, and if the gentleman from Michigan can answer the question without a speech I will yield to him.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should much prefer to answer it in my own way.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, if it requires a speech——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I think it requires a few figures and an explanation.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest there are about 68,000 post-offices, and these reports would have to be telegraphed to the postmasters and necessarily would incur a large expense.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. They are now mailed from the various service stations to all post-offices, and, in my judgment, would involve no expense.

Mr. HAUGEN. The expense of the Weather Bureau is about a million and a half.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Now, Mr. Chairman, to return to "thirdly," upon which I was addressing the committee. In my desire to acquaint the committee with the larger items of this bill, which involves practically 88 per cent of the entire amount of the bill, I desire to suggest briefly that the amount for compensation to postmasters, $24,000,000, is based entirely upon the computation of the salaries of those postmasters for which the law provides. These officers ripen from one class to a higher class from year to year, requiring an increase in the amount to be appropriated; but the salaries are fixed by the statute, based upon the cancellations, which in themselves reflect the general growth of the service. There ripened from the fourth to the third class post-offices last year 469 offices; from the third to the second, 81, and from the second to the first, 16. That, of course, will be followed by about the same proportion of increases during the current fiscal year. Taking that as a basis of our computation, we reason that the amount necessary for the fiscal year 1907 will be the amount carried in the bill. In calculating the amount necessary for clerks in the first and second class offices, we started with the total number of clerks in the service at the close of the last fiscal year. Provision was made in the current law for an increase due entirely to the increase in the business of the country, with a limited sum for the promotion of the lower grade of clerks. The committee has followed that practice in the present bill. In other words, it makes no appropriation at all for increases of salary of clerks in post-offices above the grade of $1,100. We appreciate, however, that if the Government would hope to maintain the efficiency of this line of employees, it can not keep efficient men at salaries of $600, $700, and $800 without any hope of promotion. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McGAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana how many additional clerks does this bill provide?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The total number of new clerks provided for, I think, is about 1,200.

Mr. McGAVIN. And you leave it to the administrative department to determine just where they go?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, they will be apportioned in accordance with the demands of the service. In addition to the provisions for approximately 1,200 additional clerks between the grades of $600 and $1,200, because we make no increase above the $1,200 grade—in addition, I say, to that provision, the committee has made provision for promotion purposes of clerks of the lower grades, in the hope that it will stimulate ambition, and at least allay the disposition of efficient clerks receiving low salaries not to leave the service. In some of the larger cities of the Union it has been clearly pointed out that first-class clerks, men of efficiency, men of intelligence who have been employed in the postal service leave the service to take occupation in more lucrative positions than the Government offers, and that as a result the poorer grade of clerks are left in the service, and the efficiency of the service is thereby impaired. Therefore for the purpose of stimulating this hope and ambition, and for proper treatment, I will say, based upon justice, the committee has recommended an increase of a hundred dollars each to 50 per cent of the clerks now drawing $600, 40 per cent of those drawing $700, 20 per cent of those drawing $800, 5 per cent each of the $900, $1,000, and $1,100 grade. In this way we have made some provision for promotion purposes, but with that exception, and for these reasons we feel that the committee will approve the action of the House committee. In providing for the city carrier service we have made provision solely on the basis of an increased volume of business. We have not made any provision for increases of salary, but we think we have made ample provision to meet the growing demands of the service wherever free service in cities shall obtain.

The same is true of the Railway Mail Service. The amount carried in this bill is $15,000,000, and with the exception of some officers of the railway mail department the entire sum is for compensation to railway postal clerks. We have not made provisions for any increased number of railway postal cars, and therefore have made no provision for an additional number of railway mail clerks for the purpose of new full railway postal car service. In the development of the service, when a new route is inaugurated or an old route is enlarged by reason of increased volume of traffic, it becomes necessary to enlarge the crews who handle the mail. Under the organization of the Department, these crews have a regular systematic method of transacting their business. They include a chief clerk, an assistant, and a first clerk, and a helper, and so on. A route, therefore which during the current year perhaps may have three clerks to operate it may next year have five. As the number is enlarged, the enlargement being made necessary by the increased volume of business, the system is enlarged, and with the five clerks comprising the crew there is a different method of pay. The responsibility upon the first clerk is heavier, and so forth. Hence it becomes necessary in appropriating for the Railway Mail Service to appropriate for crews in accordance with the system organized for the transaction of the Railway Mail Service on full railway postal cars, and for the apartment-car service. It therefore results in some promotion to a clerk who has been simply a first-class clerk who is advanced by the enlargement of the number of the crew to a chief clerk, and his salary becomes a little higher. But the Department does not call that a promotion, though it does result in an increase of pay, but that increase of pay carries with it an increase of responsibility. He does not get his promotion without any change of responsibility. With that explanation, I think Members will appreciate that we can well say that we have made no direct arrangement here purely for an increase in the salaries of the postal clerks without a change of responsibility.

I mentioned a moment ago that in the star-route service, that being a contract service, there has been a little change in the amount carried. We do not carry quite as much as we do in the current law, and we carried less for the current year than in the preceding fiscal year. By reason of the increase in the star service we have increased the expense. The trips are more frequent, and we now require the carriers to collect the mail and distribute it en route. We have forbidden, practically, contracts going to foreign contractors, and thereby have very largely limited these contracts to residents along the line of the service. This has resulted in increased pay. That we can well do, because, in my judgment, we get better service, and we pay more because we get more service. Therefore, notwithstanding the large extension of the rural service, resulting in some changes in the star-route service, still the total amount carried for this particular service is not greatly increased. The committee, however, believes that the Department does not discontinue the star service in as many places as it should on account of the extension of rural service, and it therefore makes a recommendation for a proviso in connection with this particular service, which it hopes will be adopted by the House. That proviso is that—

> The Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, direct the discontinuance of any star-route service whenever such service shall be duplicated by rural delivery service.

I do not believe it is the policy of the Government to give star service, or rural service, more than one delivery a day. In the commercial centers more frequent service is necessary; but in the sparsely settled sections of the country, particularly the rural districts, when they have received one delivery, including the daily paper and social mail, more frequent service, in my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of Congress, is not strongly demanded. Therefore it is our belief, and we recommend it to the House for action, that this proviso should be enacted into law, in order that when rural service shall be extended, and the patronage of the star service has become served with rural service, the star service shall give way and not be continued.

Mr. Chairman, I think I will not seek to make a detailed explanation of the 12.2 per cent of the items of the bill, having covered, as I have briefly, 87.8 per cent of the appropriation. But before concluding I wish to call the attention of the committee to two or three items which we recommend, which we hope the House will approve.

While there has been some agitation relative to the expenditure for railway mail service, no commission and no committee of Congress which has yet sought to solve that problem has seen fit to recommend any change of the existing rates of railway mail pay. But, Mr. Chairman, a practice has grown up whereby, in the judgment of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of this House, much that is now being carried in the mails can be eliminated from them without any impairment of the service, and by virtue of such elimination the weight of the mails will be greatly reduced and the amount paid will correspondingly be lessened. Therefore we recommend to the House that provision be made that as the four weighing periods shall approach in the four arbitrary geographical divisions of the country the Postmaster-General shall withdraw from the mail all of the surplus empty mail bags, and thereafter those supplies of that character shall be transmitted by freight. If you use constantly the full railway post-office cars and fast mail trains for the purpose not only of carrying first-class mail and newspapers, but supplies of the Departments as well, you not only add to the weight for which you pay the same rate, but you also take up the space and thereby require more full railway post-office cars, which require additional pay.

But, Mr. Chairman, if we should provide now for the arbitrary withdrawal from the mail in all of the sections of the country of these empty mail bags and other supplies, such action on our part would increase the cost to the Government in those divisions where the weight has already been fixed and payment established under the law. Hence by the provision we recommend that you make the elimination gradually, and thereby save the Government the difference in what the added weight of those supplies requires in pay and what it would cost in freight to transmit the same thing. And in our item for railway mail bags we provide an additional $100,000 for the manufacture of mail bags to establish a proper surplus, in order that we may not be forced by necessity to carry these empty bags by fast mail. Under present conditions it frequently happens that one section of the country is sadly in need of empty mail bags in which to transport the mail which is accumulating, while in another section of the country they have a surplus of those empty bags, but by reason of the limited number in the entire country it is necessary to dispatch those empty mail bags by fast mail, in many instances in full railway post-office cars. But if we have an ample surplus, with the prohibition to carry these empty mail bags as fast mail and the provision that they shall be carried by freight, supply can then be made wherever the demand arises, without obliging the Government to pay at the same rate for such supplies that it now pays for first-class mail.

In connection with this same provision the committee recommend another provision, which is:

> That hereafter no article, package, or other matter shall be admitted to the mail under a penalty privilege, unless such article, package, or other matter would be entitled to admission to the mails under laws requiring payment of postage.

The penalty privilege applies exclusively to the various Departments of the Government, and to-day many of the supplies of the Government, from the empty mail bags and canceling machines of the Post-Office Department to the revenue stamps of the Treasury, and to the supplies of the War, Navy, and Agricultural Departments, are carried under this privilege. We believe that the penalty privilege should simply be the equivalent of or the substitute for postage, and that no article should be admitted to the mail, to become a burden upon the mail by its weight, which is the basis of the pay, unless that same article, if presented as mail by a citizen required to pay postage, would be accepted upon the payment of postage.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question right there?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I suppose that prohibition is intended to keep the cows out of the mails.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; I think the gentleman ought not, even in a facetious way, to add to the yellow journalism of the country, as to what is carried in the mails. My friend is so little given to humor that I am afraid he would be misunderstood.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The rebuke of my colleague is worthily bestowed. [Laughter.] It is, perhaps, too serious a matter in the minds of some gentlemen to refer to even facetiously. But what I want to know is, what is the maximum weight of articles that are admissible to the mails?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Four pounds is now the maximum weight upon which postage is required.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A book or a document that weighs over 4 pounds is not admissible.

Mr. OVERSTREET. A single book is admissible.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A single volume, without regard to weight?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then a box or a mail sack of garden seed would not be mailable?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It would be mailable if the separate packages were addressed, even though they were put in one box or a bag.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. A Member of Congress can not send to the Department of Agriculture to have the residue of his garden seeds addressed at home, but he would have to send the labels and have them pasted on the packages before they could be sent home.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In my judgment, it would be a great saving to the Government even if so necessary an article as garden seeds should be sent by freight and paid for, and not sent by mail and paid for at the same rate that special-delivery letters are paid for.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I hope that we will dispense with the garden-seed question in this Congress.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I was about to say to the gentleman from Indiana that he will have an opportunity to vote upon the elimination of the garden-seed proposition.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, following along the line suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, I want to ask if, under the new provision, if it is enacted into law, the privilege which Members of the House and Senate have hitherto enjoyed of sending documents in packing cases through the mails will not be longer admissible?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The provision to which I have called the attention of the committee relates to the penalty privilege; that is, the privilege of the Department. The franking privilege which Members of Congress enjoy is under a different statute. The only privilege which Members have now of franking the entire bag of mail in what is known as "Congressional boxes" is under the construction of the statute relative to the transmission of public documents.

Mr. SCOTT. That would not be changed?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; because the presumption is that Members of Congress put nothing into the boxes except public documents. It is solely a matter of honor with the Member. If he puts in anything other than public documents, it would be in violation of the present statute. This particular recommendation does not affect it.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. I understood the gentleman from Indiana in reply to his colleague from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] to say that a book or document weighing more than 4 pounds was frankable by a Member providing each book had on it a frank and an address.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I referred to his suggestion as to the box of garden seeds.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. Let me ask this question in order that I may be right on this, as a number of gentlemen around me do not understand it. Suppose I give an order to the document room for the RECORDS of the Fifty-eighth Congress and these books come in a mail bag addressed to me at my city residence, and I desire to send them to my home address. Will the label on the bag properly franked send the whole number of volumes—weighing 50 pounds or more—or will the secretary be required to address each one of the volumes separately before they can be sent through the mail?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman from Illinois, in common with some others in the House, does not seem to appreciate that this particular recommendation relates exclusively to the penalty privileges of the Department, and does not affect the franking privilege of Members.

Mr. DICKSON of Illinois. I thank the gentleman; that answers my question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The franking privilege is under a statute which authorizes the free transmission of letter mail on official business, and public documents. The public documents may be put in a box or a bag; there may be one or a hundred; but the penalty privilege of the Department is not only under a different statute, but that particular statute is so broad in its terms that it reads "package, article, or other matter relating to the Government service." There is no such language as that with respect to the franking privilege, and Members are restricted to "official letter mail and public documents." The Departments, however, are privileged to put into the mail "articles, packages, or other matter relating to the Government service," and under the construction of that law all of the supplies of the Department have been sent through the mails, as I said a moment ago, from canceling machines for the Post-Office Department to bulky furniture in a change of headquarters of the War Department or an Army post. If we provide that no article shall be accepted to the mail under the penalty privilege, except the same article would be accepted by payment of postage, then the laws relative to the weight of the mail—4 pounds limit—would apply to the canceling machines for the Post-Office Department, or 500 pounds of revenue stamps from the Treasury Department, or a safe from the War Department on the change of headquarters of an Army post, and they would have to go by freight.

But, Mr. Chairman, instead of taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another, as has been said, it means to take out of one pocket the amount necessary for the freight and leave in the pocket of the Government the difference between the freight and the price paid for carrying by fast mail or first-class letter mail. I do not believe that it will impair the service one particle. If the Treasury Department is interested in the distribution of revenue stamps and they go in large packages, it merely means a little more prompt attention to the delivery of these stamps by freight in order that they may reach their destination by a slower method. If the articles are forwarded systematically and with proper regard to the time required by freight, no difficulty would result. Delivery by fast mail of the ordinary supplies of the Departments is certainly not essential to good administration. If the supplies can be delivered by freight at much less expense, it certainly is wise administration. Equally efficient service will be rendered, and the Government will save the difference between the cost of handling by fast mail and by ordinary freight.

If the Post-Office Department desires to distribute its canceling machines and other bulky matter in the nature of supplies, including, if you please, stamps and stamped envelopes, they can be forwarded by freight.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will yield myself a few more minutes. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It simply means that this distribution of supplies of these various Departments will be made by a slower method and at less cost. In all probability, by a little rearrangement, depots will be established which will keep in stock certain character of supplies which can be drawn upon by individual officers. These matters which I have just referred to will result, in the judgment of the committee, in the elimination, in time, of such a bulk from the mails that will lessen the amount paid without any change of rate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield.

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the committee made any estimate as to the probable savings in the cutting off of the carrying of these supplies?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It is almost impossible to make anything like an accurate estimate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the committee made any estimate as to the cost of handling the garden seeds?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The committee has not, but the Postmaster-General has recently made an estimate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the gentleman any estimate as to the cost to the Government of free matter? I see a great deal in the newspapers about the abuse of the franking privilege by Members of Congress and the various Departments.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The expressions "abuse of the franking privilege" and "abuse of the penalty privilege" have been unfortunately used in the public press, but they have been improperly used. It is no abuse for the Post-Office Department under its penalty privilege to-day to transport a canceling machine by mail; nor is it any abuse for any other Department to transmit a safe or any other supply which is an article relating to the affairs and administration of that Department. It is not an abuse for Members of Congress to send under their frank these things in bulk. The law to-day authorizes all of these things. We are not seeking by this recommendation to relieve or eliminate any "abuse." We are seeking to remedy a situation here so as to carry the same articles in a different way at a saving of much money to the Treasury. Now, to answer the gentleman's question with reference to the garden seeds, we have not done a thing in this bill with reference to garden seeds, and that fetich which so many Members are constantly setting up to be examined, and about which they desire thrown the protecting arm of the Government, has not been in any manner affected in this bill. I hope my friend from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] will join me in eliminating that from his Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I would state that I was one of those who voted to eliminate that, but I wish to say that I ask this question simply to disabuse the minds of some who I fear are laboring under a misconception. Now, I refer to the weighing of mails from the 3d of October to the 6th of November in 1899. I find that all the Government free mail matter is only about 96,000,000 pounds, or a little over 6 per cent of all the mail matter handled. If this mail matter was handled at 1 cent a pound, the same as second-class mail matter is, it would yield only about $1,000,000 in revenue to the Government. Our deficit is fourteen and a half million dollars. So even with the abuse as we have it the loss to the Government, if it was to be carried at the same rate as second-class matter, would be only $1,000,000. I do not think it is fair to assume that the deficit in the Department is due to the Government free matter.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the gentleman from Iowa in either one of the two suggestions he makes. In the first place, this does cost much more than second-class mail matter. It costs whatever it costs to carry mail upon railroad routes, and the Government does not collect from the second-class mail an amount equal to the cost of carrying it. I do not agree with the gentleman as to the cost.

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I did not make any statement as to the cost to the Government. The statement I made was that if the public documents are to be carried at the same rate as second-class matter—my contention is that the average cost of handling all mail matter is 17 cents a pound.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What does the gentleman mean—that it would cost 17 cents a pound to carry what?

Mr. HAUGEN. To carry all mail matter.

Mr. OVERSTREET. What is included in the cost?

Mr. HAUGEN. The handling.

Mr. OVERSTREET. All of the cost, including salaries and everything.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. My contention is this: If the Government will handle the Government documents at the same price as they handle second-class mail matter, at 1 cent a pound, the cost will only be $1,000,000. Of course it would cost the Government a great deal more to handle it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; it costs a great deal more to handle second-class matter than we get for it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I think it ought to be said that even if the garden-seed appropriation goes out this year, their weight will not be eliminated from the mail entirely for four years.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is correct.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Why is that?

Mr. MURDOCK. Because we weigh in four geographical sections.

Mr. OVERSTREET. One other recommendation the committee has made, Mr. Chairman, is for the keeping of a record of the weights of the various elements which enter into what is known as "second-class mail matter."

We recommend a proviso that the Postmaster-General shall keep a record for six months, beginning on the 1st of next July and ending the 31st of December, not only of the second-class mail, but of the different things which enter into and make up the total of the second-class mail. Before any article can now be admitted to the second-class mail at a penny a pound it must be weighed at the office where it is presented for acceptance. That weight is taken and a registry made of it now, so that at the end of the year we know accurately the total weight of the second-class mail upon which the cent-a-pound rate is imposed.

We propose in this bill, however, that the Postmaster-General for a period of six months, which will cover a proper portion of the year and give us accurate information, shall keep a record at the various offices where second-class mail shall be presented of the different kinds of second-class mail, the daily newspapers, the weekly newspapers, and other than daily papers, magazines, and educational papers, religious papers, scientific papers, etc., so that at the end of six months we will not only have the total weight of second-class mail, but we will know what the total weight was of daily newspapers, what the total weight was of monthly magazines, what the total weight was of educational, scientific, religious papers, etc. Now, the purpose of that record is simply this: The second-class mail comprises in weight more than two-thirds of the total weight of the mail. We receive upon this second-class mail but 1 cent a pound for postage. It costs to carry that mail by railroad much more; the estimates vary from 5 to 8 cents a pound. If, however, we knew accurately what proportion of the total weight of the second-class mail was comprised by any specific kind of second-class mail it would give us a basis for some kind of recommendation either as to an increased rate upon part of it or a different method of handling. I fear that much criticism has been made by the press against any kind of investigation of the second-class mail privilege for fear there may be an effort to increase the postage rate upon newspapers and other second-class mail. In my judgment—possibly I may be in error—much of the criticism of the press against extravagance in the postal expenditures, against certain expenditures, including the railway-mail pay, is made for the purpose of diverting public attention from the loss the Government sustains in its handling of second-class mail.

But, Mr. Chairman, your committee seeks by this recommendation to ascertain, if possible, a fair basis of inquiry. There is no purpose here to do violence to any kind of publication; but, in our judgment, the Government ought not to expedite a monthly magazine in the same way and at the same rate of cost that it expedites a letter. That the Government should not pay for the handling of bulky matter, although of a printed character, at the same rate for handling that it does for the mail of the daily press, if you please. Therefore if it should be found after this record has been properly taken, after we have found that of more than two-thirds in weight of all the mail matter a small per cent in weight is of the daily papers, and a small per cent in weight is of weekly newspapers, and a larger per cent in weight is of monthly periodicals, and a much heavier per cent in weight is of magazines, it would give us a basis for suggestion at least, either of an increased postage rate upon that article which does not require or merit expedition of service and comprises the bulk of the weight, or to change the method of handling that bulky character of second-class mail.

Mr. STEENERSON rose.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Now, can that be provided for under the regulations?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to my colleague from Minnesota.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is the gentleman sure that the elimination of second-class mail would reduce materially the amount paid for railway transportation of mail?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, it would follow, Mr. Chairman, that if the total weight of second-class mail comprises in extent two-thirds of the total weight of all of the mail, and if a considerable part of the bulky character of the second-class mail were eliminated, it would necessarily follow that the Government would pay for that much less weight of mail.

Mr. STEENERSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Is it not true that if the tonnage of the railway mail pay is 200 pounds that the Government pays at the rate of $1.71 per ton per mile, and if the tonnage is 150 tons, or 300,000 pounds, the lowest railway mail pay under the weighings that have been so far known where traffic is the most dense is 6.73 cents per ton per mile?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Five and something.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is the absolute rate. At its lowest limit yet reached, we will pay 6 cents per ton per mile instead of $1.71 per ton per mile. Now, if you take out the second-class matter, you will have to pay a very much higher railway rate upon the other classes of mail; and instead of getting letters carried for 6 cents per ton per mile you may have to pay $1.71 per ton per mile. So that the policy of decreasing the weight of mails or reducing the density of the traffic does not result proportionately in a decrease of the cost of railway transportation in proportion to total revenue from all the mail.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The argument of the gentleman from Minnesota would be sound on the assumption that all of this mail which might be eliminated was carried upon the routes where the lowest rate is now paid. But it is carried everywhere, and therefore, in my judgment, it would result in a very material saving.

Mr. Chairman, all we seek in this provision now is to secure a proper basis of inquiry. I have no doubt that there may be some merit in the gentleman's contention. But that is a matter to be examined into after we have obtained this record. It will cost but little money, because the machinery for taking the record is already established and paid for, and when that record is obtained it will give us an accurate statement of the facts, and the facts are what we need in order to make a proper recommendation relative to the heaviest class of mail affecting postal expenditures.

There is, Mr. Chairman, but one remaining recommendation of the committee to which I wish to invite the attention of this committee, and that is the recommendation prohibiting in the future the lending of the frank by an officer of the Government now enjoying the privilege of the frank. I discussed a moment ago, briefly, the suggestion we have recommended concerning the penalty-envelope privilege now enjoyed by the Departments. We recommend, in addition to that suggestion, that—

Hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person entitled under the law to the use of a frank to lend said frank or permit its use by any committee, organization, or association, or permit its use by any person for the benefit or use of any committee, organization, or association.

Mr. SMALL. May I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMALL. This provision which you have read, I understand, was to prevent political organizations in a campaign from using the frank of any Representative or Senator.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman will put it in a better form. Political committees do not now have the use of a frank, and it would practically prevent a Member lending it to a political committee. It is now lawful, Mr. Chairman, for a Member of Congress to extend the use of his frank to anybody or any committee or association; but this use is still limited to the privilege under the law, which authorizes that frank to carry free through the mails public documents, or what we call "RECORD matter"—matter from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. But, Mr. Chairman, while there is no abuse of it, because it is lawful, in the judgment of the committee the time is approaching when it is wise legislation to prevent its use by committees or organizations.

Our Government is always developing. Shrewd, far-seeing individuals take advantages of their opportunities and seek privileges which they themselves do not enjoy through the courtesy of friendship. Organizations for the prevention of cruelty to animals may get some person who is in sympathy with their movement to introduce into Congress and have printed in the RECORD an article touching upon that subject, and afterwards obtain the courtesy of the Member's frank to distribute it throughout the country. Similar organizations—for the suppression of polygamy, for the encouragement of some industry, or for the reformation of the world, or a political organization for a political partisan advantage—may obtain the same privilege in the same way.

In our judgment, Mr. Chairman, we can not be consistent and seek to prohibit a civil organization, whose purpose is to disseminate its own views free through the mail, by the use of a Member's frank, and continue the practice of the use of our frank by a political organization. We had better remove the mote from our own eye before seeking to take the beam from that of our neighbor.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I notice that while the law prohibits the lending of a frank, it carries with it no penalty. How will it be prevented? By a fraud order by the Postmaster-General against the man who owns the frank, or how will it be prevented?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is now no penalty for the unlawful use of a frank by a Member of Congress. I have always felt that those who framed that original law, and passed it, rested upon the the good faith of the Members of Congress in not abusing the privilege. Although there has been much criticism, and although there have been many charges of the unlawful use of a frank, either by a Member of Congress or under his courtesy, I do not believe there are any instances of it, but that that good faith and honor which was expected to be the basis of the use of that privilege was not misplaced. Therefore the committee has felt that simply the declaration that it shall be unlawful will be a sufficient safeguard, without imposing any particular penalty for its misuse.

I doubt very much whether, if this provision shall be enacted into law, and a Member of Congress violates it, he can be stopped from so doing, or that he can be punished for it, or that he can be prevented from doing it, and I think that the better course is to place this kind of a provision into the keeping of those now enjoying the courtesy of the frank upon their honor, and not upon the claim that they are violating a law which should be followed by a penalty.

Mr. GRAFF. I should like to ask the gentleman, if the post-office officials ascertained that a large number of documents were being sent out contrary to this provision through the mails, whether they would not, under those circumstances, deny the use of the mail to those individuals or associations?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the gentleman from Illinois is quite right. The operation of it would be not against the Member who has loaned it, but against the committee, organization, or association that was using it unlawfully.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If it will not interrupt the gentleman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not at all.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to suggest that, if we can carry out the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, it puts it up to the administrative officers of the Government, especially in the postal service, to say when it is abused. I suggest that it is far better to leave the law just where it is, and where, according to your argument, it will remain.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman misunderstands me. We do not leave it where it is now. We do not disturb the individual Member's use of that frank as an individual, but we prevent him from lending it to a committee, organization, or association.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Even for the distribution of public documents and information which our constituents are entitled to have. The proposed amendment is an abridgment upon our rights which we are not called upon to make.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The committee feels that it is not an abridgment of the privilege of any Member. The franking privilege, in my judgment, was extended to the individual, and not to an outside committee or association, and the committee believe that this House will do itself credit by stamping with its disapproval the further extension of that privilege so as to permit the use of a frank by committees and organizations.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If it will not disturb the gentleman, I should like to give him an instance. At the close of the Fifty-fourth Congress there was very little information in the country upon the silver question. Suddenly the political issue turned upon that question, and I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana that in my opinion the speech delivered by Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota, then as now an honored Member of this House, upon the gold standard and distributed generally by Members of Congress throughout the country, did more to meet and overcome the theories of Mr. Harvey than anything else that was done in that campaign. You put a limitation upon the distribution of that kind of a document, and it amounts to an abridgment that I do not think is called for at all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman works himself into a frenzy over something that does not exist.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The gentleman was in a frenzy at that time. He may not be now.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There was nothing that would have prevented the distribution of that same speech, and I did distribute them.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I distributed hundreds of thousands of them.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; and with good effect. No one now questions your wisdom in so doing.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly, but I would have done it just the same if I had not done it free, at the expense of the Government.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If you will permit me, under the language of the proposed section, the Postmaster-General, if he disagrees with your party, might issue a fraud order against the circulation of such a speech, under your amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not at all. The committee simply seeks by this proposition to stop the lending of a Member's frank to an outside committee. Great heavens! an outside committee can pay postage on it. Shall it be, Mr. Chairman, that by our opposition to this kind of a provision we shall lend encouragement to the placing of a burden upon the Treasury of the United States for the dissemination of political documents?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is a new doctrine.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is not new. Our friends in favor of free silver at that time might criticise the gentleman's position, because they might say that, but for the Government paying for this, they would not have been overturned in their argument.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Let me understand the gentleman. The speech of Mr. MCCLEARY was in answer to the speech of Mr. TOWNE, and millions of copies of Mr. TOWNE'S speech were sent out under his frank.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Exactly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And why hasn't Mr. MCCLEARY the right to send out his speech under his frank as well as Mr. TOWNE?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. TOWNE'S would not be privileged unless his opponent's was. If the gentleman from Michigan will be quiet and remember that he is an individual, just an individual——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No; I am a Representative. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; but it is also true that he is an individual.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am a Representative in this matter.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I believe I can prove that the gentleman is still an individual.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; I hope I haven't lost my individuality. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. By no means; the gentleman is asserting his individuality; but as to this provision, there is absolutely nothing in the gentleman's proposition. The Government, by transporting free all political documents, wherever the political organization is——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I think it is far better, Mr. Chairman, for the American people to get this public information that is the result of the deliberations of Congress free under the frank of Members than in any other way.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is not an item in this proposition which interferes with that right.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But you abridge it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. We do not abridge it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Then leave it out. Members are put upon their honor now and will be under the amendment proposed.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But we stand between the Treasury and the individual who seeks to relieve himself of the duty and turn it over to a political organization. The individual Member still has a right to send any speech—that is, a RECORD speech—with or without this proposition. I put it up to the gentleman again, that while it permits, even with this proposition, an individual Member to send any and all speeches under his frank, if they have been part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, it will not permit the Government to take them free, and thereby relieve the Treasury of a political organization.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I want to know—I suppose I could have found out by reading the bill, but I would like to have a statement from the gentleman—suppose the bill is law on the 1st of June and I desire to send the gentleman's speech that he is now making under my frank, can I do that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Absolutely.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is as much as I want; and the gentleman can send mine?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; and we can both send the speeches of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I wish both gentlemen would do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. What a man does by another he does by himself. If my clerk, recognized by law as my clerk, under my direction can send my speech, that is all I want.

Mr. OVERSTREET. He can, absolutely. This is a limit to the lending of a frank to a committee, organization, or association. We can not prevent outside organizations, committees, or associations who get into the RECORD, by way of courtesy of individual Members of the House, articles prepared for distribution in support of their individual views and still continue to extend to our political committees the same privilege. We merely seek, Mr. Chairman, to prevent outside organizations from taking over and using the same privilege which the law grants to individual Members of the House. It in no wise interferes with the personal privilege of individual Members of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman if, in his judgment, this provision which the committee proposes will be at all effective? To illustrate, take the case that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] put to him. Wouldn't the same committee he refers to, political or otherwise, if they were prevented from using the frank, make arrangements with some individual who might be the agent or clerk of the Member to use his frank? Couldn't they accomplish the same thing that is now accomplished without the provision?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; because this provides that they shall not lend it to any committee or to any person for the benefit of any committee, organization, or association.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, then, take the political committee.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Take the Congressional committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; take the Congressional committee, on either side of this House. It will be composed of Members who are entitled to the use of their own franks. How could you, under that provision, prohibit that committee from sending out the public documents just the same as they do now?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not from sending them out. We only prevent the Member from loaning the frank for the purpose of sending those documents free through the mails. By no means do we seek to prevent any committee or anybody from sending all of them that they please at their own expense.

Mr. NORRIS. But, as a matter of fact, the gentleman would not be able to determine who defrayed the expenses. Suppose the gentleman himself were the chairman of a political committee. He could, under his frank, send out any speech that was made here.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. But couldn't you say it was for your own benefit?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I might say so, but I think I would be violating the truth.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not a method by which anybody who would want to be a little bit unscrupulous could violate the real intent of the gentleman's provision?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman thinks that, I hope he will select somebody else to illustrate by than myself.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, I only use the gentleman as an illustration. He makes a very good one.

Mr. OVERSTREET. But the gentleman speaks of the illustration of some person who might be a little bit unscrupulous.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman is going to provide that the frank can not be loaned, but here we have several different committees in the next campaign coming on and one of those committees can not use a frank, but a Member of this House may use a frank. Does the gentleman suppose there will be any political committee of any of the political parties now in existence where they can not easily find a Member of the House of their political faith who would send out all the public documents himself, or by his clerks, as was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I commend that argument to my friend from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], because that will suit him.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, I don't know about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. That permits him to disseminate the information.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No; that is not the point, if the gentleman will permit me. What I desire to reserve is this. Let us take the case as it exists in each Congressional district. Suppose the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] makes one of his thoughtful speeches, as he did during the gold-silver controversy, and I desire to place a thousand of those speeches at the disposal of my Congressional committee over my frank. Could I do so, if this provision were upon the statute books?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman certainly could.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is all I want to know.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman what he could not do? I would like to ask him what effect it could possibly have?

Mr. OVERSTREET. He could not do this, and I ask my friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to give close attention, because I think this is the eleventh time that I have tried to explain it. He could not loan that frank to the Congressional organization known as the "Congressional committee" for the purpose of sending out all of their documents free of postage.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the object of the law that the gentleman proposes, to prevent this committee from borrowing this frank; but the gentleman could accomplish the same thing——

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Oh, the gentleman from Nebraska does not understand it.

Mr. NORRIS. By sending it out himself.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I submit to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that when he finds that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] and myself are in accord upon this, can he not trust himself to it now? [Laughter.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But we are not in accord. I am frank to say that I see the point of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] very clearly. The Congressional committee may borrow the gentleman's speech, but not his frank.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I thought the gentleman said he wanted to send it out.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Yes; but if I send it out over my frank, you might just as well leave this provision out of the law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why, no; you have a perfect right to send it out.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But the gentleman attempts to construct an artificial standard of morality which no one will observe.

Mr. NORRIS. Nor ever will.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I will leave that to the constituencies of the gentlemen.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That is a pretty bad place to leave an artificial moral standard. [Laughter.] My constituents would see through it at a glance, as would every other intelligent district.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, here is a suggestion I think will relieve the dilemma. Let us take the Republican Congressional committee, made up of Congressmen. The secretary may send out all kinds of public documents with his own frank. He is not borrowing anybody's frank. He can mail these documents to the gentleman's district, any public speech or document, and the chairman of the committee can do so with his frank. I understand that is not loaning a frank to the committee.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, it is my opinion that those who are in trouble over this item will agree with the committee that we ought to prevent the loaning of a frank to a purely civil outside organization.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Oh, all right, I agree to that. At last we are in perfect accord, as I always love to be with the distinguished gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. OVERSTREET. We ought not to permit any individual Member to extend the courtesy which Congress has given him to an independent organization, for the purpose of reducing its item of postage in sending through the mail free articles put into the RECORD for its use. If, therefore, we desire to prevent the lending of a frank to an outside organization, why should we retain the privilege of lending it to an inside organization? Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the gentleman to say it is now against the law to lend a frank for the purpose which he condemns?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No, sir; it is not against the law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do you think it is the intent of the law that it could be used for such a purpose?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think not. I said a moment ago I felt those who framed this original franking law had no thought it would be extended beyond the individual Member. But by reason of the development of committees and organizations seeking to disseminate information in which they are particularly interested, the practice has grown of having articles placed in the RECORD through the courtesy of friends in the House or Senate, and the same articles transported free through the mails under the courtesy of the frank of some Member or Senator. Now, we seek to make that unlawful.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But you do not impose any penalty.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Because there is no penalty imposed now upon the misuse of a frank.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But what does the gentleman expect to accomplish, then, by such a provision?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Why, I have said I do not believe any Member of Congress has used his frank unlawfully, and that Congress was wise to repose the confidence Congress has in his honor by not imposing a penalty, and what we hope to do is this: That when once we say that it shall be unlawful for a Member to lend a frank that the Member will not lend the frank, and that it is a higher credit to the Member to leave it in that way than if we provide a jail sentence of thirty days. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have taken——

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat——

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I notice that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEARST] has introduced a bill providing for a Government postal telegraph, which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I would like to know if the committee has given any consideration to that bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. None whatever.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Why not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, for two reasons. One is, we have not had time. I may be excused for claiming that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is a pretty busy committee and has been busy in the preparation of this bill, carrying as it does almost $200,000,000, which has taken a great deal of time. The second is that many other matters have pressed for consideration and they have not reached any definite determination as to what shall be taken up; and in the third place, nobody has asked for the consideration of it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have taken up more time that I had intended. I sought to briefly explain the more important features of this bill and to acquaint the House with the propositions of legislation which the committee considers wise.

Mr. RYAN. May I ask the gentleman this question? Suppose a man was in the Fifty-third or Fifty-fourth or Fifty-fifth Congress and then discontinued his membership or his constituents left him at home, and say he runs for the Sixtieth Congress. Are there any means by which he could send out speeches made in those Congresses of which he was a Member under some frank and by some means?

Mr. OVERSTREET. You mean if this provision was enacted into law?

Mr. RYAN. Yes, or as it now exists; and what effect would it have on a case of that kind?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The way it would operate now would be, he would obtain the favor from some Representative who is now a Member and enjoys the privilege. If this provision should be enacted into law that courtesy could be extended to the individual just the same, because all this proposition seeks to do is to prevent the lending of a frank to an organization or a committee, not to an individual. The point is simply to put Congress on the same footing with civil organizations in preventing the free use of the frank by a Member of the House. We are not restricting the individual use of it at all. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think, in the absence of other inquiries, that I will make no further observations upon this bill. The committee has presented a bill sufficient for the service.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield.

Mr. RUCKER. In order that I may understand the gentleman's position I ask this question: Suppose I send a package of 500 speeches delivered by a Member on this floor, which I desire to distribute, and cause my frank to be stamped upon the envelope containing those speeches, and mail them in bulk to the chairman of the State committee in my State, or in your State, with authority to address them to whom he pleases throughout the State; would I violate this provision of your bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It would be prohibited by this provision, in my judgment.

Mr. RUCKER. If I wanted to send out 500 speeches delivered by a Member but addressed by myself, could I send them under my frank without violating the franking privilege?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think you could.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask the gentleman if that, in his opinion, would be a violation of the law?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am inclined to think that would not be a violation of the law.

Mr. RUCKER. Then I understand the gentleman to say that if a Member of Congress who has had his speech printed in pamphlet form and desires to distribute the same writes to the chairman of his Congressional or State committee at home and receives a hundred or a thousand names and addresses, that he would violate the law in sending his speech to those people whose names are thus furnished? Am I correct in this?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, the purpose of this proposition is simply to put Congress upon a par with civil organizations. The committee believes that it is wise legislation to prevent the further privilege of lending the frank to an outside organization; and I doubt if there is a Member in the House who would not agree to that. We can not in fairness, I think—certainly not and be consistent—prohibit the lending of a frank to an outside organization and then lend a frank to a political organization for our own personal benefit.

Mr. RUCKER. But where I put the franks on myself, or cause it to be done; suppose I authorize a representative in Missouri to address out frankable matter bearing my frank? Can't I do this?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly, you can. It is only when the agent is himself a part of the outside organization that he comes into conflict with this provision. So long as he maintains his individuality, and for his individual purpose, he does not violate the provision of law recommended.

Mr. RUCKER. But if I saw fit to secure the assistance of some one other than myself or my secretary to address the envelopes——

Mr. OVERSTREET. If it is not for the benefit of the committee, then it does not violate this provision.

Mr. RUCKER. It is for the benefit of people who want to be advised about what is going on here that parts of Congressional proceedings, including speeches, are sent out.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is a matter of construction. What I say is, that if it is not for the benefit of the committee or organization, then that would not violate the provision.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say that I am in favor of proper limitations of the use of the Congressional frank, but I am not in favor of throttling a Member of Congress, tying his hands, so as to prevent the free distribution of every speech delivered on either side of this House as well as the entire proceedings of Congress.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And this will in no wise infringe upon that privilege, unless you turn it over to some committee.

Mr. RUCKER. But, as I understand the gentleman, it does infringe upon it unless the Member himself has in his mind the names of the thousands of people composing his constituents, all the people of his district, to whom he may desire to send Government publications of any kind.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It does not affect that.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understood you, it did.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not when he gives it for his own purpose; but when he turns it over to a committee for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. The committee has no use for it and can not be benefited except to the extent of circulating public documents for the information of the people.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE rose.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, just a moment and then I will yield. In answer to the gentleman from Missouri, I will say that the committee feels that if we shall seek to make any restriction on lending a frank to an outside organization, we ought to make the same restriction as to a political organization. This is a matter that is subject to amendment. I think it would be unwise to extend the privilege to ourselves and limit it to outside organizations, so long as RECORD matter" is distributed; but if the House thinks differently, they can retain the privilege. I certainly hope it will be restricted as to outside organizations. The judgment of the committee is that we would be more consistent by limiting it not only to outside organizations, but also as to political organizations.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Assuming this case: A Member of this House desires, no matter what his purpose or motive may be, to send out his speech or the speech of another Member under his frank. I understand the chairman of the committee to say that in that case the frank may be used; that the proposed provision will not conflict with the Member's right to send out such a speech or the speech of another Member.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It does not conflict with this proposition unless the act is for the benefit of a committee.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Well, will this provision put it in the power of the Postmaster-General or one of his subordinates in the Post-Office Department to determine whether or no the provision in this bill is violated, whether or no the speeches have been sent out for the benefit of this committee, or whether or no within the meaning of the provision now proposed there is a lending of the frank?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is a matter of construction that I believe we had better debate when the item is reached in the bill.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In other words, what I mean to ask of the chairman of the committee and the Members of this House is, if this provision will enable the Postmaster-General or his subordinate of the Department to exercise authority over Members of this House, making such restrictions as the Postmaster-General or a subordinate shall see fit to make, and place Members of this House at the mercy of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no; by no means, Mr. Chairman. I desire to say that this proposition makes no limitation whatever of the privilege to the individual Member of Congress in the exercise of the use of the frank.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Then what is the purpose of the provision?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The purpose is to seek to restrict it to individual purposes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Who shall determine whether the frank is loaned or not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. We hope that the Members of this House will cease the lending of franks.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In other words, you seek to set up a standard of morality for the Members of this House, and your committee has seen fit to set up a standard that you wish the Members of this House to observe.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not at all. This is merely to call back the Members of this House to what the committee believe was the original construction of the law relative to franks.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why did not the committee, then, say what they intend? Why did they not put it in such plain and unmistakable language that there could be no danger from the construction of the Postmaster-General or a subordinate of the Department differing from the construction that the chairman of the committee has just put upon it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would be glad to consult with the gentleman as to the construction. I am not specially interested in the language. The committee simply seeks to secure a limitation upon the exercise of a privilege which is extended to outside people. I think the gentleman, upon reflection, will see that if this language is not properly drawn, it can be drawn to meet that kind of a situation. We are in no wise restricting the use by the individual Member of his frank for his own purposes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. You certainly restrict the Member if you provide that he shall not lend it to a committee, and if at the same time you concede upon the floor that the Member may use it unreservedly; that he may send out the speech of another Member, though it be for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no; I do not say that. I said that he could not do it for the benefit of the committee.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Who shall determine whether he does it for the benefit of the committee? If the Postmaster-General or his subordinates may determine it, no Member of this House is safe in sending out his speeches or the speeches of any other Member under his frank. No man is safe against a construction that may be placed upon his act or upon his motive or upon his purpose by the Postmaster-General or by his subordinates. In other words, we ought to be the masters of the Departments, and we ought not to be subjected to the action and the construction and the regulation and the direction of the officers of the Departments.

Mr. RUCKER. What does the gentleman mean by the language "lending a frank for the benefit of the committee?"

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, we mean to avoid the practice of indirectly doing what we seek to prevent doing directly—that is to say, instead of lending it directly to a committee for its use, that the committee may select some individual to do all of the things which it itself proposed to do. But by lending it to the individual it would escape the violation of the law; hence we provide that it shall not be loaned to a person for the benefit of the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I owe the committee an apology already for taking up so much time, but I justify it on the ground that I have been obliged to yield frequently to answer questions.

I had hoped to be able to make enough progress with the bill to enable the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], the leader of the minority on the committee, to present his views this afternoon; but the hour has grown so late that I will ask the gentleman to wait until to-morrow, if agreeable to him, and will now close my observations in explanation of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he take the floor when the House next goes into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman want to adjourn until 11 o'clock or until 12 o'clock?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. You want to adjourn for the caucus?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has consumed one hour and fifty-five minutes.

The motion of Mr. OVERSTREET was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16953—the post-office appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 17359. An act making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 11026. An act to authorize the counties of Holmes and Washington to construct a bridge across Yazoo River, Mississippi.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference of the bill (H. R. 17666) for the construction of a sewer from Wisconsin avenue to Rock Creek was changed from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRINT OF REPORT ON FREE ALCOHOL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the document room that there is a great demand for the bill and report on free alcohol, and that they think 10,000 copies will be necessary. I ask unanimous consent for a print of 5,000 copies of the bill and report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communication was taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of State, requesting that certain officers of the Army be permitted to accept decorations from the Emperor of Japan—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Sessions, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2835); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17003) granting an increase of pension to Eleazer C. Harmon, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2836); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CHANEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16602) granting an increase of pension to Christopher C. Reeves, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2837); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16516) granting an increase of pension to James B. Fairchild, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2838); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DIXON of Indiana, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16454) granting an increase of pension to Samuel E. Carlton, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2839); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16445) granting an increase of pension to Henry H. Sibley, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2840); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16174) granting an increase of pension to John Williamson, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2841); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15807) granting a pension to Catherine Arnold, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2842); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CHANEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15566) granting an increase of pension to Andrew F. Kreger, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2843); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DIXON of Indiana, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15499) granting an increase of pension to Elias Andrews, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2844); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also presented a petition of the Improved Live Stock and Poultry Breeders' Association of South Dakota, praying that an appropriation of $60,000 be made for experimental work in what has been known as "the semiarid belt" in North and South Dakota; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KITTREDGE presented a petition of the South Dakota Live Stock and Poultry Breeders' Association, praying for the removal of the internal-revenue tax on denaturized alcohol; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENROSE presented a petition of 300 citizens of Sharon, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to protect no-license places, cities, or States against the original-package liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the Presbyterian Church of Limestone, Pa., and of the First Presbyterian Church of Marienville, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the Century Club of Pottstown, of the Reading Circle of Newcastle, and of 16,000 members of the State Federation of Women, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that an investigation be made into the industrial condition of women in the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of 300 citizens of Sharon, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Oklahoma and Indian Territory when admitted to statehood; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Conneautville, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Indian Territory when admitted to statehood; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of George G. Meade Post, No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pa., and a petition of Naval Post, No. 400, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of acting volunteer officers of the United States Navy who served in the civil war; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the First United Evangelical Church of Milton, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation extending the time for the interstate transportation of cattle; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of George A. McCall Post, No. 31, Grand Army of the Republic, of West Chester, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reduce the salaries of those employed in the Government service over 65 years of age unless amended so as to except soldiers, sailors, and marines of the civil war; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented petitions of Champion Council, No. 8, Daughters of Liberty, of Philadelphia; of Washington Camp, No. 693, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Van Dyke; of Irwin Council, No. 44, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Irwin; of Pittston Council, No. 43, Daughters of Liberty, of Pittston, and Lydia Darrah Council, No. 110, Daughters of Liberty, of Manayunk, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters of Shamokin, Pa., remonstrating against the repeal of the present Chinese-exclusion law; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Scranton, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the classification of the salaries of clerks employed in post-offices of the first and second class; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the National Wholesale Lumber Dealers' Association of New York City, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to repeal pilotage discriminations against sailing vessels in the coasting trade; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GEARIN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2578) for the relief of Alice M. Stafford, administratrix of the estate of Capt. Stephen R. Stafford, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5352) for the relief of William H. Osenburg, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 9888) granting a pension to Abigail Townsend; and

A bill (H. R. 523) granting an increase of pension to Franklin G. Hawkins.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5526) authorizing the establishment of a light vessel off Orford Reef, 5 miles north of Cape Blanco, Oregon, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PILES, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5372) to prevent dangers to navigation from rafts of logs or timbers on coast waters of the United States, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4427) to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Reno, Nev., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FLINT, from the Committee on the Geological Survey, to whom was referred the letter from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting a communication from the United States Geological Survey, requesting the approval of the accompanying recommendation to Congress, in regard to the credit of moneys received from the sale of maps, etc., to the appropriation for engraving and printing for the United States Geological Survey, reported favorably thereon, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL IN NEW YORK BAY.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5438) to establish a light and fog signal in New York Bay at the entrance of the dredged channel at Greenville, N. J., to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. As it is a matter of urgency, I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to establish a light and fog signal in New York Bay at the entrance to the dredged channel at Greenville, city of Bayonne, Hudson County, N. J., at a cost not to exceed $75,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LITTLE RIVER BRIDGE IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5521) to authorize the Tyronza Central Railroad Company to construct a bridge across Little River, in the State of Arkansas, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. On behalf of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG], I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BEVERIDGE introduced a bill (S. 5532) granting an increase of pension to Simon A. Snyder; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 5533) to appoint an additional judge for the southern district of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McLAURIN introduced a bill (S. 5534) for the relief of the estate of John F. Bryan, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5535) for the relief of estate of Reuben Millsaps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 5536) granting a pension to William O. Clark; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 5537) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to allot homesteads to the natives of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5538) relating to the education and care of the Indians and Eskimos of Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 5539) granting an increase of pension to Hermann Muehlberg; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 5540) for the relief of Albert C. Currier; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENROSE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5541) granting a pension to Ernest W. Hilliard (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 5542) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth S. Reess;

A bill (S. 5543) granting an increase of pension to William A. Humrich (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 5544) granting an increase of pension to John N. Bovee;

A bill (S. 5545) granting an increase of pension to Margaret Brennon;

A bill (S. 5546) granting an increase of pension to James A. McVicker;

A bill (S. 5547) granting an increase of pension to Hillary Beyer (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 5548) granting an increase of pension to Anthony McNally;

A bill (S. 5549) granting an increase of pension to James H. Wilson; and

A bill (S. 5550) granting a pension to Emma C. Preston (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 5551) for the relief of Paul G. Morgan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PETTUS introduced a bill (S. 5552) for the relief of John Stewart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 5553) granting a pension to Josephine Virginia Sparks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000 for the salary of a chief clerk of the Bureau of Manufactures, Department of Commerce and Labor, and also to provide for additional clerks for that Bureau, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment proposing to fix the compensation of the United States district attorney for the southern district of California at $4,500 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to fix the compensation of the United States marshal for the southern district of California at $4,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,500 for grading Upton street east of Connecticut avenue, District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the erection of tablets to mark historical places in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KITTREDGE submitted an amendment authorizing the issuance of fee simple patents to Charles Henry Bonnin and Mercy Conger, Yankton Indian allottees, for lands heretofore alloted to them, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment providing for the establishment of a roll in the United States Army to be known as the "Volunteer retired list," intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment proposing to fix the compensation of the attorney in charge of pardons, Department of Justice, at $3,000 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4403) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens in the United States," approved March 3, 1903; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted five amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the salary of the assistant clerk to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, authorized by resolution of February 26, 1903, at $1,400 per annum, be, and it is hereby, increased to $2,000 per annum, to take effect April 1, 1906.

FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I introduced yesterday and then went over under the rule.

Mr. FRYE. It is entitled to consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which has come over from yesterday.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. HEYBURN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with information in detail as to the amount of money that has been collected under the provisions of section 5 of the act entitled "An act providing for the transfer of forest reserves from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture," approved February 1, 1905, from the sale of timber, from grazing privileges, rights of way, and from canals, railroads, telephone lines, etc., and for permits to conduct hotels, stores, and other lines of business upon forest reserves during the last fiscal year, and an approximate estimate of the amount that will probably be collected during the present fiscal year; also for what purposes the money already collected is being expended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution just read.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, just a word of explanation may be sufficient. The resolution only calls for such information as it will be desirable and necessary to have in the consideration of legislation coming before the Senate.

I understand informally that about $700,000 has been collected under section 5 of the act referred to in the resolution. This is a fund that is authorized to be expended without any direct appropriation authorizing its expenditure. Therefore, it is one about which the Senate will naturally want to have some information.

Mr. GALLINGER. It relates to the Forestry Service?

Mr. HEYBURN. It relates to moneys collected under section 5 of the act transferring the Forestry Service from one Department to the other. It is rather a large fund to be expended without some detailed information as to what is being done with it and from what sources it comes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad to get this information. From listening to the resolution one could not very well determine what it did cover—not that it was not drawn carefully—and I think an explanation was needed. Does the Senator know whether any of this large fund that is in the control of the Department without being specifically appropriated for has been spent?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the object of the resolution in part to know whether it has been expended, and if so, for what purposes, as well as to know from what source it is being collected, giving us an idea as to what proportion of the fund is coming from this or that source, and also as to how much of it is being expended for one branch of the Department or for another. In other words, it is information that we will need here.

Mr. HALE. I agree with the Senator. I think we ought to have it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On March 30:

S. 4198. An act granting permission to Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, retired, to accept the decoration of the order "Pour le Mérite, für Wissenschaften und Kunste."

On March 31:

S. 4628. An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof; and

S. 4833. An act to amend an act entitled "An act permitting the Washington Market Company to lay a conduit and pipes across Seventh street west," approved February 23, 1905.

On April 2:

S. 5204. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Yellowstone River in Montana;

S. 5211. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River at or near Lewiston, Idaho; and

S. 5184. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between Walworth and Dewey counties, in the State of South Dakota.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 12323. An act to extend the public-land laws of the United States to the lands comprised within the limits of the abandoned Fort Crittenden Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 16014. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to create the southern division of the southern district of Iowa for judicial purposes, and to fix the time and place for holding court therein," approved June 1, 1900, and all acts amendatory thereof, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 17507. An act to open for settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in my remarks of yesterday I briefly answered the inquiries made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], both of whom had some misapprehension regarding the purpose of my proposed amendment providing for the national incorporation of railways.

The Senator from Idaho seemed to be under the impression that it was proposed to exempt these national corporations altogether from State taxation. I wish to say that that was not my purposes. My purpose was simply to provide a method of taxation which would be uniform throughout all the States in the Union and would result in a tax which would be mathematically exact, thus relieving the railroads of the necessity of interfering in politics, as they do in every State in the Union, upon the subject of taxation, and also making the tax a fixed and certain factor in the calculation of rates.

MERGER—HOW ACCOMPLISHED.

Then, as to the inquiry of the Senator from Georgia, who asked how I proposed to have the merging of State corporations with national corporations accomplished, I have to say that I propose that merger shall be accomplished in the same way that the merger of the corporations organized in different States is now accomplished.

As it is, Mr. President, we find that the 2,000 or more railroads of this country are already practically merged into ten or twelve systems, and that each one of these systems is incorporated under the laws of a particular State. Now, how is it that this merger has already been accomplished? It has been accomplished under laws passed in the different States permitting such merger. These laws vary in their character and in their expression, but they all have a common purpose, which is to permit the consolidation of existing lines, the consolidation of State roads with roads organized under the laws of other States. Some of these laws simply permit consolidation with corporations created under State laws. Others also permit consolidation with corporations created under United States laws.

As to the bonds, the process is easy. Each railway system would organize a national corporation under the national law and would transfer all its property to such corporation subject to the existing bonded indebtedness. As the existing bonds matured they would be retired by an issue of the bonds of the new company, and thus in the end the bonds of the new national corporation would be substituted for the bonds of the constituent State corporations. As to the stock, the process would be no more difficult than that frequently gone through with in existing consolidations of State corporations. The stock of the old companies would be surrendered and the stock of the new company substituted. Of course, the stock issue of the new company must be subject to the approval of some tribunal, such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, in order to avoid overcapitalization. But I take it that a fair method of valuation of the stock of the existing road could be secured. Individually I should favor a very liberal adjustment. I should recognize the market value of existing stocks, whether watered or not. The watering of stock in the past has had many causes, among them the difficulty of promoting such enterprises without giving investors some speculative chance. The railroads have been obliged to work out their own salvation, unaided by wise laws, and while possibly some of these exaggerated stock issues have been the creation simply of stock speculators many of them have been necessitated by financial exigencies. At all events, the stocks are now in the hands of the investing public and have largely gone out of the hands of those who originally issued them. If we can only guard the stock and bond issues of the future and prevent overcapitalization—all of which is provided for by my proposition—we can easily afford to validate much of the overcapitalization of the past.

The amount of stock which should be issued in new national corporations to the stockholders of the old constituent companies could be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The merger is accomplished by various methods. The stock is often interchanged. The company which desires to accomplish the merger of a railway in another State provides for the issue of stock, which is issued to the stockholders of the merged railroad in exchange for their existing stock.

Merger can be accomplished through a national corporation as well as through a foreign State corporation. The method is perfectly simple. It is a method which has been worked out in years of financiering. If the railroads wish to come under this national system, there will be no difficulty about their securing the consent of the States in which they at present operate, and there will be no difficulty about their financing the operation.

The advantage of a national incorporation act is that instead of allowing the capitalization to be, as at present, unrestricted, subject only to the judgment or caprice of those financially interested, the Government of the United States, through its Interstate Commerce Commission, will sit in judgment upon the capitalization and determine it justly and fairly.

The Senator from Georgia seems to assume that the States will be unwilling to give their consent. Do they not at present give their consent to unrestrained and unrestricted consolidation? Have not the States in the South, ten or twelve in number, permitted the merger of their two or three or four or five hundred railroads, as they existed originally, into two great corporations, each of them foreign, one organized under the laws of Virginia and the other organized under the laws of Connecticut? Has there been any difficulty there in obtaining consent? If you go to the statutes of these States, you will find consent expressly given; and in all of the laws of Virginia you will find consent given not only to merger with corporations organized under the laws of the State, but consent given to merger with corporations organized under the laws of the United States.

Now, are the people of the United States in earnest in demanding that capitalization shall be restricted? Does the Senator from Georgia doubt that? Does he doubt that the people of the United States insist that there should be some restriction of the capitalization of these great systems, or does he think that the people are content to allow these great promoters to juggle with the matter, unrestrained and uncontrolled?

I take it the people of the United States are in earnest upon this question; I take it that the people of the Southern States are in earnest upon this question; and if a method is pointed out through national incorporation by which capitalization can be restrained (and under the existing system of State corporations overcapitalization is not restrained) I submit that as a choice between two foreign corporations, one the corporation organized under the laws of a sister State in whose legislation they have no share, and the other organized under the laws of the United States in whose legislation they all share, they will seek the shelter of the latter.

TAXATION BY STATES.

The Senator also objects upon the ground that this system involves the surrender of the power of taxation by the States. Mr. President, it is not essential to this plan of national incorporation that we should include in it a scheme of taxation of railroads. It is not at all essential. It is desirable, but it may be left out if it is the judgment of the Senate and the House that it should be.

I point out its desirability simply because of the great powers of discretion now given to local assessing and taxing bodies, powers of discretion which involve the assessment of these properties at from $10,000 a mile—the mere cost of their rails and the right of way—up to $75,000 and $100,000 a mile, including their franchises and valuations based upon the market value of their stock and bonds.

The scheme of taxation also involves the possibility of double taxation, for the bonds and stocks in the hands of individual holders may also under existing conditions be assessed and taxed.

It is this very uncertainty that keeps these railroads in politics. They are obliged to be in politics, because they have a property value of $10,000,000,000 subject to the discretion of these various taxing bodies, subject to the passion and the caprice of different localities, and subject to the legislation of reformers and cranks and blackmailers. Can we expect them under such conditions to keep out of politics? I want to keep them out of politics by providing a fair and uniform system of taxation that will be absolutely certain in its mathematical calculation, that will leave nothing to the discretion of the taxing officers.

When we do that we accomplish two purposes. We keep the railroads out of politics on the subject of taxation, and we also secure an additional factor of certainty in the determination of rates, which involves the ascertainment of the gross receipts, the operating expenses, and the taxes, and a fair return upon capital. The taxes, therefore, are a factor in the determination. We now have varying taxes, which may be this year one-third of what they will be next year, as in the case of Michigan, for recently by a new system of taxation the taxes of the railroads in that State have been trebled in amount. So all over the United States we may have this varying taxation, which tends to uncertainty in the determination of rates.

Mr. President, I have already stated that it is not necessary to put in this bill a scheme of taxation, for the main purpose of national incorporation would be to control capitalization and interest return as factors in rate fixing, but it is desirable; and I believe on an appeal to the common sense of the American people upon this proposition Congress can declare that these railroads, incorporated under a national incorporation act are national instrumentalities in the exercise of the great national powers of the common defense, of the establishment of post-offices and post-roads, and of the regulation of interstate commerce, and when it declares them to be instrumentalities of the National Government it can, if it chooses, absolutely exempt them from taxation. I do not propose it shall do that, but if it can do the greater thing it can do the less. It can then prescribe the method of taxation and the rule of taxation by the various States.

Under the method which I suggest, a tax of a certain percentage upon the gross receipts of national railroads, to be levied by the States according to mileage, we have a tax that may be mathematically fixed, that will be just to the railroads, that will be just to the States, and will retain for them the revenues which they now have and possibly secure them greater revenues than they now have, and at the same time secure a certain factor in the regulation of rates which will be of incalculable benefit both to the State boards and to the national board.

RATE MAKING A GUESS.

At present rate fixing is a guess. Ask any member of the Interstate Commerce Commission that question and he will say it is a guess. It is true that the Supreme Court has endeavored to reduce it to something of a science by saying that the Commission must have regard to value, to cost of construction, to the original cost, to the market value of the stocks and bonds, and to a fair return upon the valuation after considering all these factors. But these factors should be as certain as possible.

We must have a valuation. First, I prefer to see a valuation represented in the stocks and bonds fairly and not in an exaggerated form, and so I urge national incorporation as a means to that end.

But at all events it seems to me that the Congress of the United States in parting with its legislative discretion on this subject and turning over the regulation of rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission is bound to fix a rule by which that Commission shall proceed; it is bound to provide for valuation, and it is bound to provide for a fixed return in the shape of interest upon that valuation. Then it will leave to the Commission only the mathematical process of working out the calculation and distributing the burdens of transportation within the rule established by Congress upon all the various industries and commerce of the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Do I understand the Senator to say that we are bound to fix a rate of return upon the valuation in fixing rates?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; we ought as a matter of duty to do so. What I meant to say was that we are now turning over to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix just and reasonable rates; that that is all the power that Congress has. It could not give to the Commission the power to fix unjust and unreasonable rates. Under the limitations of the Constitution all that Congress can do is to fix just and reasonable rates, and when we turn over that power to the Commission we turn over all the power we have.

Mr. HEYBURN. Right there I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me further, I think in order to fix the constitutionality of this legislation beyond a doubt we ought in this very act to fix the rule, the standard, by which this Commission should act.

Mr. HEYBURN. The measure?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The measure.

Mr. HEYBURN. The measure of what constitutes a just and fair return?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would the Senator think we could go so far as to say it should not be more than a certain per cent upon the value?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do. Not more and not less than a certain per cent.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I will renew the question I submitted the other day. Would that not be for the Government to guarantee a given income upon the investment of any transportation company?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. If we say that they shall be entitled to earn 6 per cent, does that not give them the right to charge such tolls as will result in producing 6 per cent on their investment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course it does and it ought, if that is the return fixed by Congress as a reasonable return.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would it not result, then, in this, that the Government, by legislation as directly as the Government can act, guarantees a given fixed rate of income upon the investment represented by the stock and bonds of every transportation company in the land? Does it not amount to that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not a legal guaranty, Mr. President. It simply involves nonreduction by the Commission of the rates of a corporation as long as they produce only the return fixed by law.

Mr. HEYBURN. If we say that a reasonable rate shall be fixed and that 6 per cent shall constitute a reasonable rate of return to the company, why is not that true? And if it is true, do we want to do that?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say, in reply to that, that the fixing of a limit or percentage which these railroads shall receive upon a valuation fairly ascertained is not a guaranty of that percentage, and it never has been so regarded in the legislation of this country.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is that an authorization? I should like to substitute the word "authorization" to the company to fix its tolls so that they would insure a return of that percentage.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], a question, with the permission of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. Suppose Congress should enact a law providing that no corporation created pursuant to an act of Congress, incorporated by virtue of a national incorporation act or law of Congress, should be permitted to realize over 4 or 5 or 6 per cent, would that be a guaranty that they should realize that amount?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not unless it was coupled with the other suggestion that I understood the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] to make, that we were authorized to say what should constitute a fair and reasonable return, and that having determined that the corporation was entitled to earn it, of course it naturally follows that it would be entitled to adjust its tariff rates in such a way as to produce a result of that kind, taking the two propositions together.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In reference to that I would say, of course a corporation has a right to adjust its rates so as to produce the return fixed by Congress, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, in exercising its supervisory power over rates, would be compelled to have in view the return fixed by Congress; and it is only fair that the corporation should have that return, if it is possible for the corporation to get it out of its business.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I do not annoy the Senator by an interruption, I should like to inquire if there is any other department of the business world where the Government undertakes to insure to the investor any return whatever? Why not as well the manufacturer demand the same rights as the transportation company? What difference is there in the relation which they bear to the economic system of our Government?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The shortest answer to that is that the Government does not insure. The Senator might as well insist when we pass usury laws in the States of the Union providing that the lawful rate of interest shall not exceed, say, 6 per cent, that we guarantee every investor that he will receive 6 per cent upon his money. This limitation of return is no new thing in legislation. The United States Government has done it in previous legislation. When Congress incorporated the Union Pacific Railroad or the Texas Pacific—I forget which—it provided that the rates should not yield a return of more than 10 per cent upon the investment.

Ten per cent was then the going rate of interest, just as 4 or 5 per cent is the going rate of interest now. The Government gave that corporation the power to fix rates that would yield it 10 per cent, and provided that the regulating power of Congress should be only applied in case the return exceeded 10 per cent. That is a case in the history of our legislation where the return was absolutely fixed by the act of Congress.

In the State of Massachusetts I understand the returns to all the electric railroad companies are fixed by law. No corporation of that character there can declare any dividend of over 6 per cent. All profits over that amount are divided, one half going to the State and the other half going to the corporation.

The result is that none of these companies ever return more than 6 per cent. They keep down their rates. They expend their income in new investments, in extensions of their lines, and in the betterment of their roads.

I repeat, this is not at all a new thing in legislation. I call the attention of Senators to one thing, which is that the Supreme Court has said that fixing rates is not to be a matter of guesswork; that the railroads are entitled to a fair return upon a fair valuation. If that is so, it seems to me that it is the duty of Congress to provide for the valuation. It is an essential. The railway commissioners of all the States have been in session recently in Washington, and you will find in the morning's paper that they have adopted a resolution calling upon Congress to provide for the valuation of railroads, their appurtenances, and their equipment in every State of the Union. That is to be done not by the local commissions, but by the national commission.

These men, experienced in the business of regulating railroads, know how adrift they are under present conditions; they know that they can not regard simply the capitalization of these roads. In some cases such roads are undercapitalized, and in many other cases they are overcapitalized. Nor can they always take into consideration the market value of the securities in determining the value of their property, because these securities are up and down. I read some quotations yesterday to show that the stock of certain roads had increased in value from 300 to 600 per cent in ten years. So this association of State railway commissioners has asked Congress to provide for the valuation of these properties, and it seems to me their recommendation is entitled to some consideration here.

What valuation would a national corporation act provide for?

It would provide for an initial valuation at the very time when the company was organized. When the company was organized and presented its scheme of consolidation to the Interstate Commerce Commission, it then would have to state to that Commission the amount of bonds and stocks that were to be issued. The Commission then would make an inquiry as to the value of the property, in order to determine upon the amount of its capitalization, either approving the amount submitted or reducing it if the circumstances warranted it, and that corporation would then be allowed to issue only the amount of stocks and bonds so approved. From that time on we should have a permanent valuation of the property of that corporation. To that may be added from year to year the amount expended in improvements and betterments, less the depreciation that takes place. Thus throughout the years we should have a constant valuation of these properties accomplished by the aid of the legislation which I suggest, and the value would be represented in the capital, in the stocks, and bonds.

This system would make these railroad securities the best securities in the country, and railway bonds could be negotiated at 3 per cent under such a system. As to the stocks, instead of being variable, as they are now, they would be fixed and certain in value and go into the hands of the investing public, instead of being controlled and manipulated, as they are now, by the stock speculators.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, before leaving that subject I will ask may not this investigation and sifting down of the values of corporate property for the purpose of arriving at a basis upon which to estimate what would constitute a fair return be as well accomplished without the national incorporation feature suggested by the Senator?

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I suggested in my remarks yesterday, if we do not conclude to provide for national incorporation in this bill we should at least provide for a valuation of these railroads engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that I am in hearty accord with him in regard to that matter. I have endeavored to cover it by a bill already introduced and before the committee, providing for just as stringent an investigation as is suggested by the Senator, to be had not through the means of national incorporation, but allowing the corporations to exist under the statutes as we find them, and doing it through a board of interstate-commerce commissioners, and arriving at this information annually, for the purpose of having a correct basis of value upon which to estimate what would constitute a fair return.

I do not believe that the Senator will meet with any opposition in this body or elsewhere if he confine his amendment to that proposition by providing a method of determining real values, because it is essential that we should have a method of determining them. It is obvious, I think, to every Senator that before you can determine what would constitute a fair and just return you must know upon what that return is to be based.

OPPORTUNITY FOR AMENDMENT.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to know that the Senator from Idaho has introduced such a bill; but let me make a suggestion to the Senator from Idaho, and that is that he put his bill in the shape of an amendment to this bill, for experience shows that legislation upon the subject of interstate commerce is very rare and infrequent. We have now reached a crucial point in that legislation: we have a bill before us to which any amendment in the line of reform can be attached, and I suggest to the Senator that he frame an amendment to this bill, for otherwise I should very much fear that the valuation which he calls for will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would say, in reply to that suggestion of the Senator, that it has not occurred to me that we have reached a point in the consideration of this bill where it is necessary to formulate every suggestion that may occur to the minds of Senators in the shape of amendments. I think we are from day to day gathering new light upon the scope and effect of this legislation. I have in my desk, with a view to considering the propriety of introducing it as an amendment, a provision along the line suggested in the remarks that I have made; but I do not feel that the time is ripe yet or that the necessity has arisen for introducing it. I am not at all apprehensive that a vote will be reached upon this bill with such unexpected haste as to make it dangerous to defer the consideration of these measures until we are quite sure that our minds are clear as to exactly what we want to do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will review the history of legislation upon the subject of interstate commerce, he will find that Congress has not very often awakened from a condition of apathy and inertia and indifference upon the subject. Interstate commerce was given over without let or hindrance to the railroads of the country until 1887. Then it was only after a very severe struggle, in which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] took so prominent a part, that the people were successful in securing the passage of legislation that brought them only some degree of regulation and control.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but I will suggest, if I may, that it took eight years to reach any conclusion on the question of interstate commerce.

I remember—that is, if my memory serves me correctly, and I think it does—hearing a Member of the House of Representatives from Texas at that time, Mr. Reagan, introduce the original interstate commerce bill in that body. I listened to its discussion through several winters from the gallery, looking down upon it, and I followed it through the public press through all the years while it dragged along; and it took, I believe, about eight or nine years to arrive at any conclusion whatever on the subject. Then, after an interval of about that many more years, Congress attempted to resume the consideration of it. So, I repeat that I have no fear of such a hasty determination of the conclusion of this question in this body as to make it dangerous to postpone the introduction of amendments.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course, if the Senator thinks that ten or twelve years is a mere trifle in the consideration of the question of this reform, my appeal to him will have no weight; but, I repeat, if the Senator will review the history of legislation upon this subject, he will find that it has been very difficult to wake Congress from indifference and apathy. It was not until 1887, after eight years of agitation, that the meager bill which was passed upon this subject found a place in the statute book. Years and years were involved in the discussion of rebates and preferences, but it was not until the great trunk lines of the country, headed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company three years ago, came to the conclusion that it would be an advisable thing to have legislation upon the subject that legislation was enacted.

Since then Congress has rested upon its oars, and Congress will probably rest for five or ten years more upon its oars after this bill is enacted. I warn every friend of reform upon this question, every man who views with apprehension the growing power of these railroads, who views with apprehension their increasing capitalization, who views with apprehension their activity in politics—I warn them that if they wish legislation looking to reform upon this subject put upon the statute book now is the time and this bill is the place.

POLICE POWERS OF THE STATES.

Mr. President, I wish to state that my suggestion involves no interference with the police powers of the various States. This idea of national incorporation fully comprehends the fact that there are two sovereigns that are dealing with the question of commerce—the great national sovereign and the lesser State sovereign, each supreme within the limits of its jurisdiction; the National Government, absolutely supreme upon every inch of American soil, regardless of State lines, within the powers granted to it by the Constitution, and the States, absolutely supreme in all the powers relating to sovereignty outside of the powers granted to the nation. Here we have machines called "railroad corporations" running railroads on American soil through American States, used for State commerce and for national commerce—State commerce under the control of the States, and national commerce under the control of the United States.

It is simply a question of judgment between us as to whether we shall leave such machines to be created by the State sovereignty under its powers as to State commerce or whether we shall permit them to be created by the national sovereignty under its powers as to interstate commerce. These railroads have grown from mere local systems into great national systems. I believe it will be a proper thing for the great national sovereignty to create the charters for these railroads. I do not propose to force them into a national incorporation. I hope it will be so just and so fair, and relieve them of so many complications, political and otherwise, that they will gladly seek the shelter of national incorporation. At the same time, I do not propose to interfere with the police or taxing powers of the States, except so far as is necessary to establish a uniform rule of taxation, which will operate to the advantage of every State in the Union.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator's theory of Federal incorporation were adopted, and every railroad corporation in the United States engaged in interstate commerce and also in State commerce were a Federal corporation, does the Senator contend that that would oust the regulatory power of the State?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. Then what would be gained? Although railroads are State corporations, so far as interstate commerce is concerned Congress now has the power to control them. The States can not control them. The States control intrastate commerce. How would that change the situation essentially?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say that when I said "not at all" I meant that the bill which I have submitted does not affect the regulatory power of the States over intrastate commerce. As to whether a law could be so framed as to affect that, I will not discuss at present. I have been inclined to think that if the National Government should create a national corporation for interstate commerce it might possibly be regarded that any attempt by the State to regulate the State commerce carried upon that road would be regarded as burthening a national instrumentality and as such involving possibly the power to destroy it. The courts might possibly uphold a provision in a national law which forbade the State to regulate State commerce on a national railroad.

Mr. SPOONER. The question, Mr. President, which the Senator makes as to the power to destroy would obviously arise only as to the exercise by the State of its power of taxation, but——

Mr. NEWLANDS. The decisions thus far relate entirely to taxation.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; to taxation; but it is undeniable that to-day Congress has the power to create Federal corporations for conducting interstate commerce. In the Senator's idea, which is a very large and far-reaching one, there is much of merit; but my question really goes to this, whether, without an amendment of the Constitution, what the Senator has in mind could be effectively, in any large degree, carried into operation. It is utterly impossible, I take it, under the existing Constitution, for Congress to create a railroad corporation to engage in interstate commerce, which it may do, which could oust the States of their regulatory power of purely intrastate commerce. So that we would still have what the Senator deplores, Federal regulation of interstate commerce and the State regulation of purely domestic or State commerce. That would be far away from what the Senator wants to accomplish.

Then, as to the power of taxation, is the Senator certain at all that the States in taxing private property—for a railroad chartered by the Federal Government would be private property within the boundaries of a State—can be made to enforce a rule of taxation which is created by Congress? The States exercise their taxing power under their own constitutions. Is it competent for Congress, under the existing Constitution, to take away from a State in any degree the power to tax property within its own limits, its own boundaries?

The Senator's plan is one entitled to great respect and consideration. There are large views in support of it, but what has troubled me about it is the constitutional power to really efficiently carry it into effect by any bill which we can enact.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will endeavor to answer both propositions to which the Senator has referred, namely——

Mr. SPOONER. They are questions, not propositions.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As to whether we can legislate in such a way as to deprive the State of its regulatory power over intrastate commerce, and, second, as to whether we can legislate in any way as to affect the State's power of taxation over railroad property within the State.

As to the first proposition, I will say that there is no effort made in the measure which I propose to affect the power of the State over purely State commerce. That would remain; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that, whilst it is, of course, inconvenient to have forty-five State commissions acting at the same time with one national commission upon the subject of these rates, and whilst it would be very much better, in my judgment, to have one national commission that would regulate the rates of both State and interstate commerce, when that commerce is conducted by the same road, yet as to rates the ultimate control is in the United States Supreme Court. If the rates are fixed by a State commission unfairly and unjustly and in such a way as to deprive the corporation of a fair revenue, the corporation can take that case into the United States courts and to the Supreme Court and they will be adjudged invalid. So that, in the end, the power of the United States is exerted in one form or the other, either through the legislature or the courts upon commerce, both State and national.

As to the power of taxation, I admit that it is an open question, not yet fully determined by the courts; but I submit that all the decisions indicate clearly that if the United States incorporates a railroad as a national instrumentality and declares it exempt from State taxation, the court will enforce the exemption. There is a case in which the question of the exemption from State taxation of a railroad organized under a national charter has been considered, and that is the case of Railroad Company v. Peniston (18 Wall., 5), where the Union Pacific Company, a national corporation, operating under a national charter, but without any exemption asserted in the statute from its liability to State taxation, claimed that because it was a national corporation and a national instrumentality its property was by implication exempt. There were eight judges who sat in that case. Three of the judges declared that without any express exemption in the statute the entire property of the railroad company as a national instrumentality was exempt from State taxation. As to the other five judges, four declared that the exemption would apply only to the powers and operations of the national instrumentality and not to the property used by the agent in charge of it. But the three judges who held the other way declared that the railroad itself was the instrumentality for carrying out the power, and that therefore it was exempt. The fifth judge was between the two. He held that such property could be exempted by Congress from taxation, but that it was clearly the intention of the statute not to exempt it. So he held in that case that the property was subject to taxation. If the statute in that case had expressly declared that the railroad property should be exempt from State taxation, the court would have stood four to four upon that proposition. In the decisions since that time the Supreme Court has expressly reserved that question as an open question for the future.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I would ask the Senator if he thinks there is no distinction between that case and a case where the Government chartered a road running through a State or attempted to do so? The line to which the Senator has referred, as he must know, was chartered to run through the Territories of the United States and not through the States. It commenced in a Territory, ended in a Territory, and ran only through Territories.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is true, Mr. President. There was only one of the Pacific railroads, I believe, which ran from a point in one State to a point in another, and that was the Texas Pacific Railroad. But the court does not take that into consideration at all, as the Senator will see.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is mistaken about that. The Northern Pacific is another.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was not aware of that. I thought it was entirely constructed through Territories.

Mr. SPOONER. No; not at all.

Mr. TELLER. I want to call the attention of the Senator——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will read the language——

Mr. TELLER. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in the litigation of which he speaks—the Union Pacific litigation—the parties claimed that in the act the road was exempted from taxation. It was in the power of Congress to have exempted that property from taxation, if it saw fit. Why? Because it was to run through a territory absolutely under the control of the General Government. While the power to exempt it in a Territory exists, it might not exist, and I do not think it does exist, in a State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator is mistaken in his assumption that the counsel claimed in that case that the statute itself exempted the property from taxation. It was admitted on both sides that it did not.

Mr. TELLER. No; I did not mean to say it exempted it in words, but in principle, because it was performing a duty for the General Government and had a charter from the General Government.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the question as to its being a Territory was not considered, for it must be recollected that the Territories had given way to States, and they were complaining then of State taxation. I will read from the opinion of Judge Bradley, who wrote the dissenting opinion, and who states the case also for Mr. Justice Field:

> The Union Pacific Railroad Company, therefore, being a United States corporation, created for national objects and purposes, and deriving its existence, its powers, its duties, its liabilities, from the United States alone; being responsible to the United States, now as formerly, for a whole congeries of duties and observances; being subjected to the forfeiture of its corporate franchises, powers, and property to the United States and not to any individual State; being charged with important duties connected with the very functions of the Government, every consideration adduced in the cases of McCulloch v. Maryland and Osborn v. The Bank would seem to require that it should be exempt not only from State taxation, but from State control and interference, except so far as relates to the preservation of the peace and the performance of its obligations and contracts. In reference to these and to the ordinary police regulations imposed for sanitary purposes and the preservation of good order, of course, it is amenable to State and local laws.

As an instrument of national commerce as well as Government operations, it has been regulated by Congress. Can it be further regulated by State legislation? Can the State alter its route, its gauge, its connections, its fares, its franchises, or any part of its charter? Can the State step in between it and the superior power or sovereignty to which it is responsible? Such an hypothesis, it seems to me, is inadmissible and repugnant to the necessary relations arising and existing in the case. Such an hypothesis would greatly derogate from and render almost useless and ineffective, that hitherto unexecuted power of Congress to regulate commerce by land among the several States. If it be declared in advance that no agency of such commerce, which Congress may hereafter establish, can be freed from local impositions, taxation, and tolls, the hopes of future free and unrestricted intercourse between all parts of this great country will be greatly discouraged and repressed.

Again:

But it is contended that the laying of a tax on the roadbed of the company is nothing more than laying a tax on ordinary real estate, which was conceded might be done in the case of the United States Bank, in reference to its banking house or other lands taken for claims due in the course of its business. This is a plausible suggestion, but, in my apprehension, not a sound one. In ascertaining what is essential in every case, respect must always be had to the subject-matter. The State of Maryland undertook to tax the circulation of the United States bank established in that State, etc.

Mr. Justice Bradley goes on to state the case with reference to the United States bank, and then continues:

But the primary object of a railroad company is commerce and transportation. In its case a railroad track is just as essential to its operations as the use of a currency or the issue or purchase of bills of exchange is to the operations of a bank. To tax the road is to tax the very instrumentality which Congress desired to establish, and to operate which it created the corporation.

Such is the opinion of three of the eight justices who sat in that case.

The opinion of four of the justices was delivered by Mr. Justice Strong, who, after referring to the object and purpose of the legislation creating the Union Pacific Railroad, said (p. 32):

Admitting, then, fully, as we do, that the company is an agent of the General Government, designed to be employed and actually employed in the legitimate service of the Government, both military and postal, does it necessarily follow that its property is exempt from State taxation?

Emphasizing the difference between the operations of an agent and the property thereof, Justice Strong said (p. 33):

It may therefore be considered as settled that no constitutional implications prohibit a State tax upon the property of an agent of the Government merely because it is the property of such an agent.

Then, after consideration of the various cases bearing upon the general question, Justice Strong summed up as follows (pp. 36–37):

It is, therefore, manifest that exemption of Federal agencies from State taxation is dependent not upon the nature of the agents, or upon the mode of their constitution, or upon the fact that they are agents, but upon the effect of the tax; that is, upon the question whether the tax does in truth deprive them of power to serve the Government as they were intended to serve it, or does hinder the efficient exercise of their power. A tax upon their property has no such necessary effect. It leaves them free to discharge the duties they have undertaken to perform. A tax upon their operations is a direct obstruction to the exercise of Federal powers.

Eight justices heard this case, and the opinion of the court upholding the validity of the tax was concurred in by four of them. A fifth, Judge Swayne, concurred in the judgment, but said:

I see no reason to doubt that it was the intention of Congress not to give the exemption claimed. The exercise of the power may be waived, but I hold that the road is a national instrumentality of such a character that Congress may interpose and protect it from State taxation whenever that body shall deem it proper to do so.

So that Judge Swayne would have decided against the majority of the court had there been exempting legislation. Two other justices flatly dissented, giving an opinion to the effect that such State taxation was invalid, even in the silence of Congress. And the eighth justice merely remarked: "I dissent from the opinion of the court."

All that can be claimed from this decision as to the power of Congress to exempt a corporation from taxation by affirmative legislation is that the court was evenly divided, and even this can not be fairly claimed, for the case of exempting legislation was not before the court, and the opinion of the four justices who upheld the tax does not contain a word which denies the power of Congress to exempt the property which it expressly declares to be its chosen instrumentality.

So out of eight justices four expressly declared that Congress could exempt the property of a national instrumentality in the hands of a national agent from State taxation, and the question therefore is an open one to be determined in the future.

Mr. TELLER. In that case the court did not hold what the Senator says it did. It simply held that in that particular case, where the company had been chartered by the general authority of the Government in a Territory, it was within the power of Congress. That is all it did hold. I am very familiar with that case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Of course the decision was with reference to that particular case.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to discuss it with the Senator, but I will say to him that the court was dealing with the particular case of the railroad which was brought before them, and they took that charter and were simply saying what Congress might have done, but what Congress did not do. That case is pretty well understood, and the Senator can find in it no support for his contention. Of course, if the Senator depends upon the law of the minority, he can find a good deal of law that is not recognized as the law. A man may sometimes think it is pretty good sense, but the law is what the majority holds.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Undoubtedly the law is what the majority holds, namely, that where a statute does not exempt property employed by a national corporation in the exercise of its powers, that property is not impliedly exempt from State taxation. But four of the judges expressly held that where the statute does exempt, the property would be exempt from State taxation.

Mr. TELLER. In that particular case.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And hence I submit I am justified in the statement that the question is an open one. I think the logic and the reasoning are entirely with the four judges who declared that the National Government, creating a corporate agent for the purpose of carrying out a national power, stamping the property of that agent as an instrumentality for the exercise of that power, can protect it from destruction by another sovereignty upon whose soil it has a right to operate. There can be no question of the power of a national corporation to enter any State without the consent of that State, and to build a railroad and to exercise the power of eminent domain and to take part in interstate commerce. The National Government itself can do it, and if the National Government can construct a railroad, would it be held for a moment that that railroad would be subject to State taxation?

The National Government, under the power to establish post-offices and post-roads, builds post-offices in the States. Do we have to ask the State to exempt them from taxation? No. Years ago it was thought necessary to obtain a special State statute exempting such buildings from State taxation. Now it is the universally recognized doctrine that the public buildings put up by the National Government in a State in the exercise of its governmental functions can not be taxed.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Aside from the question of law, aside from the question whether Congress has power to exempt such property in the States, does the Senator think the States would ever for a moment submit that railroad property within their borders should not be subject in any degree to local taxation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not think they would. It is impossible to get through such a bill, and I would not ask to have it passed. All that I wish to accomplish is to have a uniform rule of taxation that will make the taxes of railroads a certainty, so that they will keep out of politics upon this subject, and so that we will have a definite factor in the determination of rates.

Mr. SPOONER. Do not the railroads get into politics more on the question of regulating rates than on the question of taxation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I think they are in politics upon both; and they have to be.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator would leave them in politics as to the one?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Because I can not help it. But still as to that the Senator must recollect that they have the protection of the national courts, which are bound to see to it that no State regulation deprives the company of a fair return upon its property. The courts have modified very much the doctrine asserted in the case of Munn v. Illinois, where it was declared that the power to regulate was a legislative power; that it was no objection to the power to say that it would lead to legislative abuse; that the only remedy for legislative abuse was a resort to the polls. That was a poor remedy given to the corporations by that decision, for we know how ill any corporation would fare at the polls in seeking a redress of injuries. But we do know that since that time that doctrine has been seriously modified, and the courts have now taken the property of these corporations within their protection and have given them ample protection. They do not simply protect them against confiscation, but they protect them in a fair and reasonable return upon their property and in a fair and just compensation for the services which they perform.

Mr. President, I have, at the risk of being tedious, gone quite fully into the principles which should, in my judgment, govern the regulation of rates. I believe that it is our duty to provide for a valuation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce and to fix the returns which the corporations are to receive on such valuation. If these two factors are established the whole system will tend automatically toward a reduction in rates as the business of the railroads increases.

AUTOMATIC ADJUSTMENT.

A system of national railway corporations strictly controlled as to capitalization, limited as to their returns to a certain percentage, with taxes mathematically certain, with a proper allowance for an insurance and pension fund, with proper provisions for conciliation of disputes between employees and the railroads, would result in an automatic adjustment that would do away gradually with excessive rates and all the abuses arising from preferences and discriminations as to individuals or localities. The tendency would be to equality and reasonableness of service. If we enter upon a system of proper capitalization of these roads, involving a fair and fixed return in the shape of dividends, the Interstate Commerce Commission will hardly ever have cause to act, and, automatically, the entire administration of these roads will tend toward impartiality in place of partiality, and reasonable rates instead of unreasonable rates, to the betterment of the roads instead of exhausting the roads with a view to paying dividends on watered capital.

NATIONAL OWNERSHIP.

The people will look for simplicity in whatever plan of relief is proposed, and unless we unify and simplify the control of transportation in a few thoroughly regulated great national corporations, whose finances and operations can be easily understood, and whose functions will be entirely taken out of politics, they will drift into national ownership as the easiest solution.

The argument in favor of national ownership is an attractive one. Outside of the United States three-fifths of the world's trackage is in national ownership, and not a single nation that has entered upon national ownership is inclined to withdraw from it. Japan, only recently coming out of the stress and strain of a great war, has passed an act for the purchase of all private railroads in Japan, at a cost of $250,000,000.

The plan of acquiring national ownership would not be difficult. It would not involve the entire readjustment of the present system. It would be easy to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to institute suit and condemn the shares of stock of all the railroads in the country engaged in interstate commerce, leaving the bonds outstanding as a lien upon the property. Thus the interests of the stockholders would be purchased by the nation and the Interstate Commerce Commission could step into the position of director of the various corporations, with their present organization of officials and employees, and could gradually work out a method of national administration.

The present gross revenue of all the railroads would be amply sufficient to pay all the fixed charges of the companies and the low rate of interest upon the Government bonds issued for the purchase of stock and produce a surplus which would make ample provision for betterments and extensions, and also provide a sinking fund which would extinguish the debt before many years.

Or, should the country determine to take hold simply of the new construction of the future, leaving the existing railroads in the hands of their present owners, the Government could easily build a railroad of 3,000 miles across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific, which would become the spinal column of a great governmental system.

Government ownership presents no difficulties, either constitutional or practical, and the country will certainly drift to it unless the existing abuses of uncontrolled monopoly, of overcapitalization, of accomplished union between the producing and transportation interests of the country, of political control, and of unjust preferences and discriminations are done away with. Even assuming that the government management may not be economical, the time may come when the people will regard equality of service as of more importance than economy of service. But the plan of national incorporation would give the country the benefits of government ownership with none of its dangers. It would abolish the evils which have arisen from unrestricted monopoly, automatically bring about a reduction in rates, put the railroads out of politics, and retain the management of the able men whose genius created our present efficient system of transportation. No complaint can be made as to this efficiency; no complaint can be made as to consolidation properly controlled in its capitalization. No attempt should be made to raid the property of railroad investors. No attempt should be made to destroy or impair the existing values of their securities. Unity of control, simplicity of organization, certainty in valuation of railroad property and in return upon such valuation to the stockholders, certainty in taxes, fair recognition of the dangerous character of the service of the employees, proper provision for insurance against accidents and old age, conciliation of disputes between the carriers and their employees, are parts of the full and comprehensive legislation which this subject requires and which would differentiate our legislation from the incomplete and fragmentary legislation in which Congress has thus far indulged regarding interstate transportation.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, much time has been expended and learning exploited in discussing the Federal judiciary. In some respects this discussion has been more academic than practical, although interesting and instructive. It is remarkable that in this day and generation, after more than a century and a quarter of national life, there should be such a disputation in the Senate of the United States as that we have been listening to at intervals during the last three weeks. I had not supposed the Federal judiciary could have been made the subject of such controversies as have engaged the attention of the Senate. While my principal purpose in arising, Mr. President, is to submit some observations on one or two of the more practical features of the proposed legislation, since it seems to be the fashion, I will, with the indulgence of the Senate, first pay my respects to the courts also.

DUTY TO ORGANIZE COURTS.

Some new and interesting questions have been raised, or, rather, some old and interesting questions have been revived. It has been said that the Congress was not obliged to establish inferior courts. Mr. President, I believe it was the imperative constitutional duty of the Congress to create the Supreme Court and to establish inferior courts. It was as much the duty of the Congress to establish inferior courts as it was to create the Supreme Court. The Constitution did not create the Supreme Court nor any other tribunal. It simply declared that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." Upon that short and simple declaration the Federal courts are founded. The judicial power was vested, but no court, not even the Supreme Court, was created. The Constitution did provide that there should be a Supreme Court, but it did not provide for the number or qualifications of the judges who were to constitute the court nor make any provision for its organization. That was left to the Congress, just as the establishing of inferior courts was left to the Congress. It has been said that the duty of Congress to create and organize the Supreme Court was mandatory, but not so as to the inferior courts. As to those courts it has been said that it was left to the discretion of Congress to establish them or not. To that view I can not give my assent. The Congressional duty was as imperative in the one case as in the other. The inferior courts are as essential to an adequate judicial system, such as the Constitution contemplated, as the Supreme Court. The judicial department was established by the Constitution as a coordinate and independent department, and its functions were as well defined as those of any other department. It is as necessary to the orderly conduct of public affairs and as necessary to national life under our governmental system as either the legislative or executive departments. Without a Federal judiciary there would be no courts in which controversies to which the United States was a party, or in cases arising under the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and other causes, could be heard and determined. Without a Federal judiciary there would be no courts in which numerous crimes against the United States, committed both on land and sea, could be punished. The Congress might enact laws and the Executive might stand ready to execute them, but without courts the law would be a dead letter and the executive arm would be powerless. The Supreme Court alone would not suffice, for the Constitution expressly limits its original jurisdiction to two classes of cases—those against ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State is a party. In all other cases the Constitution declares that the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction only. Except as to the two classes of cases specified, all controversies which are beyond the reach of the State judiciary would be without a forum for their settlement if there were no inferior courts of the United States. Even if the Congress could clothe the courts of the States with the judicial power devolved by the Constitution upon Federal courts, which Judge Story denies, it would manifestly and inevitably lead to conflict and confusion. The Government could not be successfully maintained and administered on the plan laid down by the Constitution without the inferior courts. They are just as necessary to the public safety, to the protection of private rights, and to orderly government as the Supreme Court itself. It does not seem to me that this can be intelligently controverted. The eighth section of Article I of the Constitution conferred upon Congress power "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court." Did not the bestowal of the power to do this necessarily carry with it an obligation to do it? The same section of the same article conferred upon Congress the power—

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

To establish a uniform rule of naturalization.

To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.

To establish post-offices and post-roads.

To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations.

To raise and support armies.

And to enact other laws for purposes specifically enumerated and necessary to the orderly administration of the Government. The language of the Constitution is: "The Congress shall have power" to enact laws for all such purposes. The Constitution did not say that the Congress shall enact such laws, but shall have the power to do so. Could the Congress have refused to exercise that power? I think not. When the power was conferred, by necessary implication the duty to exercise it attached. The grant was equivalent to a mandate. Necessarily, discretion was given to Congress to adopt such forms of legislation and to establish such agencies as they might deem essential to accomplish the purposes contemplated by the Constitution, but they could not refuse to act at all. If the Congress had refused to do the things they were given power to do, among others to establish such courts as were necessary to the proper administration of the law, they would have been recreant to duty and to their oaths.

But it is said that the Congress could not have been compelled to establish inferior courts. If by that it is meant that there was no official power which could have exercised that compulsion, the statement of course is correct. The Constitution and public opinion are the only things that can compel Congress to perform any duty. Beyond these there was no power to compel Congress to create the Supreme Court. Therefore it may be said that Congress could have obliterated the whole judiciary by refusing, in the beginning, to provide for any tribunals, high or low, supreme or subordinate, which could exercise the judicial powers written into the Constitution; or, in other words, that the Congress could in that way have wiped out that much of the Constitution. Mr. President, it requires some patience to seriously consider a suggestion of that kind. The faintest intimation that it was ever possible for Congress not to provide, and fully provide, for a complete Federal judicial establishment is too puerile for consideration even as a test of the legislative power. Such an intimation belongs to the distempered domain of dreams and hallucinations. It presupposes that Senators and Representatives in Congress would ignore their oaths and deride the Constitution, and it presupposes that the men who made the Constitution were bent on destroying, in the very hour of its birth, the governmental fabric they had created. Further still, it presupposes that the men of the Revolution, the people themselves, whom the Congress represented and to whom they were amenable, also desired to immolate the fruits of their victory on the altar of chaos. Mr. President, that is to suppose a situation that is not supposable. The Congress were compelled to provide for the organization of the Supreme Court and to establish such inferior courts as the Constitution contemplated, or be guilty of moral and legal treason.

CAN NOT DESTROY.

Mr. President, those who hold that the power imposed upon the Congress to establish inferior courts was merely permissive, or in other words, those who contend that Congress was not bound by the mandate of the Constitution to establish them, also contend that since they have been established Congress may now destroy them. It is said that since Congress created them Congress may abolish them; that what the Congress has established it may disestablish; that what it has done it may undo. I deny that also. Congress can not constitutionally do any such thing, and therefore can not do it at all. These courts were established as a public necessity and in pursuance of a public policy outlined in the Constitution. Their existence is essential to national vitality, and they exist in obedience to a constitutional direction. The Congress had power to create, but has no power to destroy. Congress can not destroy the judiciary any more than the judiciary can destroy Congress. Of course, if the people themselves want to destroy the Federal judiciary it can be done. It might be done by a constitutional amendment, and even without that, if the people wanted it done, Congress might, in the execution of a revolutionary propaganda, devise expedients for wiping out the courts, from the supreme tribunal down. But in the same way Congress could destroy any other political division of the Government. If Congress should refuse from year to year to provide for the support of the executive department; if it should refuse to provide for the support of the Army and Navy; if it should refuse to make provision for the public debt—in other words, if the Congress should refuse, with popular approval, to perform its functions, of course the Republic could not survive. But none of these things could be done except with the approval and by the direction of the American people. Mr. President, all talk of that kind is idle, fantastic, chimerical, impossible. The people could destroy the judiciary, but it is not within the power of Congress alone to do it. If to-day the Congress should pass an act abolishing all the circuit and district courts of the United States without substituting other tribunals in their stead, can there be any doubt that the Supreme Court would declare the act to be unconstitutional and void? If it did not, it would be unworthy to occupy the high place it holds in the respect of the American people. I do not mean to say that Congress can make no change in the Federal judiciary. I do not mean to say that Congress might not reorganize the judiciary and abolish, if you will, the circuit and district courts as they now exist, provided that other courts, no matter by what names designated, with substantially similar jurisdiction, should be established to take their place. I think that would be within the province of Congress, but that is a very different thing from the wiping out of the judiciary altogether. An act absolutely destroying the inferior courts of the United States would be unconstitutional, in my opinion, and if so, Congress, of course, would have no right to pass it.

MAY DEFINE JURISDICTION.

But, Mr. President, while it was the constitutional duty of the Congress to ordain and establish courts, and while the Congress has no constitutional power to destroy them, it does not follow that they can not, within the limits of the Constitution, enlarge or restrict their jurisdiction and regulate their practice. That is something the Congress may do. The Supreme Court has decided that the judicial power of the United States, although it has its origin in the Constitution, is, except in enumerated instances, applicable exclusively to the Supreme Court, dependent for its distribution and organization and for the modes of its exercise upon the action of Congress, and has decided that Congress may invest the courts it creates with jurisdiction either limited, concurrent, or exclusive, or withhold jurisdiction from them to whatever extent Congress may deem proper for the public good; and the Constitution expressly provides that the Congress may regulate appeals to the Supreme Court. That Congress is clothed with power, except in a few specified instances, to define the jurisdiction of the Federal Courts has been so often decided that it may be considered as settled law. And this is as it should be.

Mr. President, I have a profound reverence for the opinion of Thomas Jefferson. He was sometimes suspicious of the courts. Once he even went so far as to say:

The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working underground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our Constitution from a coordination of a general and special government to a general and supreme one alone. * * * Having found from experience that impeachment is an impracticable thing, a mere scarecrow, they consider themselves secure for life. They skulk from responsibility to public opinion, the only remaining hold on them, under a practice first introduced into England by Lord Mansfield. An opinion is huddled up in conclave, perhaps by a majority of one, delivered as if unanimous, and with the silent acquiescence of lazy or timid associates, by a crafty chief judge, who sophisticates the law to his mind by the turn of his own reasoning. * * * A judiciary independent of a king or executive alone is a good thing, but independence of the will of the nation is a solecism, at least in a republican government.

With all due respect for this greatest of American statesmen, I fear that this utterance was prompted more by his antagonism to the great Chief Justice of that day than by his deliberate judgment. Moreover, while I believe it to be true that the sovereign rights of the States and the people have been often encroached upon by judicial interpretation, still, taken as a whole, the record of the judiciary is a proud one, and the courts have frequently stood as the solitary and impregnable refuge of the Constitution.

Mr. Jefferson spoke with greater dignity and sagacity and more like the statesman he was when he said:

> The dignity and stability of government in all its branches, the morals of the people, and every blessing of society depend so much upon an upright and skillful administration of justice that the judicial power ought to be distinct from both the legislative and executive, and independent of both, so that it may be a check upon both, as both should be a check upon that.

In each instance Mr. Jefferson was addressing himself to the Federal judiciary. Although, as I have said, he spoke not without prejudice and resentment in the first quotation I have read, there was, nevertheless, enough of truth in his malediction to show that the founders were wise in delegating to the legislative department the power of defining the jurisdiction of the courts.

It has been asked, "What is meant when it is said that Congress may define the jurisdiction of the courts?" The question can be answered only in general terms, and that is sufficient. It is enough to say, in general terms, that the Congress may determine the forum in which controversies may be judicially heard; that they may put limitations upon the jurisdiction of those forums whenever and wherever jurisdiction is conferred by them; and they may prescribe the mode of procedure to be observed from the initiation of an action to its close. But, while this is primarily true, it is not within its limitations. While it is true that Congress is clothed with power to define the jurisdiction and regulate the practice of the courts, they can not constitutionally so restrict that jurisdiction as to paralyze their arms and make them utterly incapable of affording relief. That can not be done, for the effect of that would be to destroy the courts. If it was the constitutional duty of Congress to establish courts, then equally was it their duty to invest them with every adequate power necessary to the proper and effective exercise of their functions. It was as much their imperative duty to do the one as the other. The two things are inseparable and of equal importance. The legislative duty is the same in both. And in neither case is it a purely optional duty, or a mere matter of legislative discretion, but in both it is a high, commanding constitutional duty. The last clause of the eighth section of Article I of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have power—

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution * * * all powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof.

The Supreme Court and the inferior courts established by Congress constitute the judicial department. The Constitution declared that there should be one Supreme Court, and left it to the Congress to provide for its organization. The Constitution did not establish the inferior courts, but they are founded in it. They were not created by the Constitution, but created by Congress in obedience to the constitutional mandate. The judicial power of the United States was vested in these courts; and the Congress was given power to enact all laws necessary to enable the courts to exercise their legitimate functions. When this power was granted to Congress the duty of utilizing it was imposed. A constitutional obligation, express or implied, can not be ignored without offense to the fundamental law. No, Mr. President, the power that Congress may exercise over the courts is not absolute, plenary, unbridled. The Constitution by necessary intendment and implication has put limitations upon that power. Congress may say what courts shall have jurisdiction of criminal causes, but it can not deny jurisdiction to all courts to punish crime. That would leave the Government and the people at the mercy of the lawless. Congress may determine what courts shall have jurisdiction of civil causes, but they can not absolutely deny to all courts the power to hear and determine controversies which may arise within the judicial jurisdiction prescribed by the Constitution. That would be to deny justice altogether; to deny a remedy for all wrongs, public or private; and it would lead inevitably to universal chaos. The Congress may regulate the practice of the courts, but they can not deny to the courts the right to issue any process whatever, and thereby render nugatory the powers with which they are invested. The Congress may regulate the forms and the manner of executing all processes, but they can not deny them altogether. They may put limitations upon the issue and service of process, but not to the extent of denying process altogether, nor of so circumscribing it as to make the judicial power a sham and a farce. The legislative power may change the formalities of judicial procedure, but not so as to make the enforcement of rights impossible. It was well said by the supreme court of Michigan, in the case quoted by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania (75 Mich., 283), that—

> When they [the legislature] vest judicial power they do so in accordance with all of its essentials, and when they vest it in any court, they vest it as efficient for the protection of rights, and not subject to be distorted or made inadequate.

My learned and eloquent friend the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has called our attention to the case of Fink v. O'Neil (106 U. S.). The justice who delivered the opinion in that case did say that the Federal courts had no authority to render judgments or to issue executions or other process, except when authority to do so had been conferred by the legislative department. He did say that those courts have no inherent authority of that kind. But, Mr. President, that statement was unnecessary and inapplicable to the case before the court. It was obiter dictum. The point at issue in that case concerned the sale of a homestead, which, under the laws of Wisconsin, was exempt from seizure and sale under execution. Under the laws of Congress the Federal courts are required to conform their practice to the laws of the States, respectively, in which they are held in so far, at least, as these laws are applicable. It was contended that the exemption law could not be plead against the sovereign—that is, the Government—as it might have been plead against a private suitor. The point at issue concerned not the power of issuing an execution, but the power of enforcing it. The power to issue the execution unquestionably existed, and the execution had, in fact, been issued and placed in the hands of the marshal. The question was whether a certain property, exempt from execution under the laws of the State, was subject to sale at the suit of the Government as a sovereign. The same question would have arisen even if it had been admitted that the courts had inherent powers, for still the protection of the exemption laws, enacted to promote a wise public policy, might have been invoked. The justice who made the declaration referred to went beyond the record, and therefore what he said in that behalf is not entitled to the weight of a judicial deliverance.

POWER OF SELF-PROTECTION.

Mr. President, I do not contend that the Federal courts are invested with all the inherent powers that appertain to courts existing at common law and by proscription. Such a contention is unnecessary, and I would not sanction it if it were made. At the same time, I am unwilling to admit that the courts are so utterly dependent, so devoid of power—inherent power, if you please—as to be incapable of moving a hand to protect themselves against annihilation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BULKELEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to hear the Senator from Missouri express himself directly on the question as to whether Congress has even the power to prevent an inferior court from issuing a preliminary injunction to suspend the rate established by this railroad commission.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me at present, I will treat very fully upon that in a few moments, but I would rather not just at this time.

It is to be presumed, must be presumed, that the courts will themselves obey the Constitution and keep within its limitations. It must be presumed that the courts, as well as the Congress, will respect and obey the Constitution. It must be presumed that the courts will uphold the laws of Congress unless they clearly contravene the fundamental law. They have often declared it to be their duty to sustain legislative enactments and to reconcile them to the Constitution whenever it can be done. That is the uniform judicial policy of all American courts, both State and Federal. It is curious to note that those who fear the power of the courts and live in dread apprehension of judicial usurpation are constantly quoting the Supreme Court itself to prove that the judiciary is dependent upon the legislative pleasure. No, Mr. President, I believe the highest public good requires that the courts should be left undisturbed in the possession of all their constitutional powers. I think these powers are ample for self-protection. Congress could not destroy the courts if they would, and should not if they could. The Constitution embodies the wisest thought of the wonderful men who made the Republic. It is the most perfect work of its kind ever devised by the wit of man. It is inconceivable that a great department, like the judicial department, should have been established and then made wholly subservient to the legislative will and helpless in its presence. The three great departments established by the Constitution are coordinate and coequal. Neither towers above the other—supreme, absolute, imperial—but the same Constitution is over them all. Within their respective spheres each is supreme. But above all is the power of the people. The harmony and symmetry of this superb creation should not be marred. It should be left as the fathers made it.

COURT REVIEW.

Mr. President, I come now to consider briefly and to express my view upon the particular question which has given rise to all this discussion about the courts. The question is, Shall jurisdiction be expressly conferred upon the circuit courts to review the orders which may be made by the Interstate Commerce Commission prescribing rates to be charged and regulations to be observed by railroads as common carriers? And if so, then with what limitations, if any, shall that jurisdiction be hedged about? The bill provides that, after certain findings and formalities, the Commission shall have power to prescribe what shall be a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate to be thereafter charged as the maximum rate, and to prescribe what regulation or practice in respect to a given transportation is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed. There is no express provision in the bill authorizing a judicial review of orders that might be predicated upon these provisions. The question is, Shall an express provision of that import be inserted in the bill? That appears to be the question; but, Mr. President, it seems to me that to consider this question in that form is to proceed in the inverse order and upon a false premise. It is to proceed on the assumption that the bill as it stands in some way denies the right of judicial review. But that is not true. The bill as it passed the House, and as it stands to-day, does not deny the right of judicial review, nor even attempt to limit it. On the contrary, sections 15 and 16 of the bill, as reported, expressly recognize that right. Those sections provide that the orders of the Commission shall take effect at the end of thirty days after notice, unless such orders shall have been suspended or modified by the Commission itself, "or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction."

If the bill should be enacted in its present form, and the Commission should prescribe a rate which was confiscatory or noncompensatory, could there be any doubt that the carrier affected would have the right, under existing law, to apply to a circuit court for relief, or that the court would have power to grant whatever relief the nature of the case might warrant? If the bill should pass in its present form, could there be any doubt that the same jurisdiction would attach if a rate established should not be fairly remunerative? Under the powers now possessed and exercised by the circuit courts can there be any doubt that they would take jurisdiction of any cause, involving a sufficient sum, which concerned a rate alleged to be confiscatory or noncompensatory? If that be true, then the power of judicial review exists already, and there is nothing in this bill which seeks or pretends to divest the courts of that power or to limit them in its exercise. There is, therefore, no need of a special provision to confer a jurisdictional right of review. The real question is not whether this power of review shall be conferred upon the courts, but whether it shall be enlarged upon the one hand, or withdrawn or limited upon the other. This bill proposes to enlarge it. It proposes to authorize the courts to determine not only whether a rate is confiscatory, but whether it is fairly remunerative. Whether this jurisdiction should be enlarged is a question of such doubtful wisdom that I hesitate to approve it. I doubt whether the jurisdiction now exercised by the courts can be wholly withdrawn, and I am confident it ought not to be. Railroads are sometimes guilty of flagrant abuses, but for that reason, no matter how outrageous their offending, they should not be shut out of the courts and put wholly at the mercy of an administrative board. Because they offend, because they do wrong to others, is no reason why the Congress should deny them access to the courts of justice. That they should be curbed, restrained, regulated, is manifest and imperative; but that they should be outlawed is absurd. When their rights are in jeopardy they are entitled to a hearing. Undoubtedly, in my opinion, the Commission should be given authority to prescribe rates to be charged and regulations to be observed by the carriers; but the rates and regulations should at least be just and reasonable—actually so. If any rate so prescribed should be unjust, or should not be compensatory, it should not stand; and if any regulation prescribed should be unjust or unreasonable, it should be set aside. I do not think any fair-minded man in or out of Congress will controvert that. It follows, then, that if the Commission should adhere to an order which a carrier might deem to be unjust and unreasonable, the controversy must be settled in the courts. It must be settled in the courts because there could be no other forum for settling it. I can hardly believe that any Senator would deny jurisdiction to the courts to hear and determine controversies of that character, even though he believed that Congress had power to deny it. If that be true, Mr. President, as I am sure it is, then it is useless to discuss the question as to whether Congress could, by affirmative enactment, place the orders of the Commission above and beyond the reach of the courts. There is no use talking about something nobody wants to do, and which many think can not be done. We had better discuss things which some of us, at least, think ought to be done, and some of us think we have power to do.

Mr. President, this whole subject is narrowed to two propositions: The first involves an enlargement of the judicial power, and the other a limitation upon its exercise. Paradoxically, the two things are not necessarily in conflict. Both may be done without inconsistency. Under the law as it is to-day, the courts have jurisdiction to hear and determine whether a prescribed rate is so high as to be extortionate, or so low as to be confiscatory. Between these two extremes it seems to be conceded in the arguments I have heard, the courts can not go. It is said that if a rate is not so high as to be extortionate, nor so low as to be confiscatory, the courts can not interfere. They can not intervene, so it is said, between the two extremes to say whether a rate fixed by the Commission is fairly remunerative. The courts have said that if a rate is not compensatory it is confiscatory. A line has been drawn here between what is justly compensatory and what is fairly remunerative. But the line is a narrow one—so narrow as to be scarcely distinguishable. The line between "compensatory," simply, and "fairly remunerative" is more distinct; but the line between "justly compensatory" and "fairly remunerative" is difficult of discernment. It is a little hard for me to differentiate between the two; and it is a little hard for me to understand why a court has power to determine whether a rate is justly compensatory, or even compensatory, and yet is without power to determine whether a rate is fairly remunerative. On the other hand, it is evident that between the extremes of extortion and confiscation, as those terms are understood, the Commission should have some discretionary power in establishing rates. What latitude should be given to that discretion is problematical. But, Mr. President, as the courts now have power to intervene to set aside a rate which is extortionate or confiscatory—that is, a rate which oppresses the shipper or which does not bring a fair return to the carrier upon the capital invested and labor expended—I am inclined to think it would be wiser, at least in the experimental stage of this new administrative authority, not to invest the courts with any powers not already possessed. If the courts have not the power already to determine whether a rate made by the Commission is fairly remunerative, I doubt if it should be conferred upon them. For the present, at least, we had better leave that question where it is. But to do that the bill should be amended. As it now stands it seems to me that that power would be, by the very terms of the bill, conferred upon the courts. If the bill should be amended so as to authorize the Commission to prescribe just and reasonable rates—using those words, "just and reasonable"—and by striking out the clauses which provide that the orders of the Commission shall stand unless set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction, that would leave the matter, so far as the jurisdiction of the courts is concerned, where it is already. Moreover, it seems to me that the power to fix just and reasonable rates would answer all the purposes of this legislation. Under that phraseology it would be the duty of the Commission to establish rates that were "fairly remunerative," and something should be conceded to the administrative integrity of the Commission.

But, secondly, Mr. President, even if the jurisdiction of the courts should be affirmatively extended so as to authorize them to determine whether a given rate was fairly remunerative, the courts might still be limited in the method of granting relief. That they should be limited in this behalf, particularly with respect to injunctive relief, I am certain. The reasons for this are founded in a sound public policy, and they are of the highest importance. If the railroads could take up every order made by the Commission for a judicial review, and on an ex parte and prima facie showing obtain a temporary injunction suspending the operation of the order during the interval of litigation, often greatly prolonged, the efficacy of the law would be greatly impaired, if, indeed, its effectiveness would not be practically destroyed. At all events, if that should be permitted it would render the administration of the law difficult, tedious, exasperating, and expensive. A law of this kind to be effective, and orders of this kind by a commission of this kind to be of value, must be promptly enforced. The courts should be open to every suitor, but the privilege of resorting to them should not be turned into an abuse. While guarding the right of everyone to seek a judicial remedy for private wrong, the exercise of the right should be so regulated as to prevent it eventuating in a public wrong.

Mr. President, I would not deny the substantial right of injunctive relief to the carrier. Some able lawyers have said that that can not be done, and it may be that they are right.

But I would provide in this bill that injunctions suspending or setting aside the orders of the Commission should be applied for only upon notice and granted only after a hearing. I believe the Supreme Court would uphold a provision of that nature as being within the purview of the legislative power. The Congress has power to regulate the practice of the courts and to place such limitations upon the employment of their processes as may be, in their judgment, necessary to the public good, provided, as I have said, the limitation does not go so far as to vitiate judicial administration. The fact that such a restriction would apply to all railroad corporations as a class, and the fact that railroads are quasi-public highways, and that railroad corporations are quasi-public bodies, clothed with extraordinary powers and privileges, would answer the objection that such a restriction was vicious because it was special. If such a restrictive provision should be inserted, and if all cases involving a review of the Commission's orders should be given a preference on the dockets of all the courts, the controversies would be speedily determined and the possible damage would not be great. If it be said that the damage, whatever the amount, suffered by the carrier under that practice would be irreparable, it might be answered that the damage to the public under a contrary rule would be even greater and more irreparable; and I assume that the courts, while regardful of private rights, would not be oblivious to the public interests.

Besides, Mr. President, it should not be forgotten that a proceeding against the Commission to prevent a damage resulting from their orders would not stand upon the same ground as a proceeding to prevent waste or other injury by a private person. The Commission are a public body, charged with the performance of public duties, and under obligation to deal impartially with all interests, and their orders are made under the obligation of an oath and by direct authority of the law. They should not be put upon a level with the trespasser, nor should their orders be treated as if made in a spirit of wrongdoing, hostility, or unfairness, or with any intention to oppress. Their orders are entitled to that consideration which should always be accorded to the deliberate action of every official body. If they act within the limits of their authority, it should be presumed that they have acted properly, and their orders should not be suspended upon the mere ipse dixit of an individual complainant. They should not be set aside, even provisionally, without a hearing. The public interest and public policy alike forbid it.

Mr. President, my conclusion is that if some such provisions as those I have indicated should be inserted in the bill they would solve the problem. So far as limiting the jurisdiction of the courts is concerned, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] embodies substantially what I have in mind, and while not committing myself to the exact phraseology of his amendment, I am in harmony with what he seeks to accomplish.

THE PRESIDENT'S AMENDMENT.

Mr. President, on Monday the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] offered an amendment. This is understood to be an amendment proposed through the Senator from Kansas by the President of the United States. The confession made here last Tuesday in the open Senate by the Senator from Kansas confirms that understanding. On Sunday morning last the papers contained an account of a meeting at the White House of several Republican Senators of the select Presidential set for consultation with the President and the Attorney-General. It is reported that for some hours they sat in solemn conclave on the rate bill, and in due course the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas was hatched. By this amendment it is proposed to strike out the clauses now in the bill which provide that the orders of the Commission shall take effect after thirty days, unless they shall be suspended or modified by the Commission itself, or be suspended or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, and in lieu thereof to provide that the orders of the Commission shall take effect within such reasonable time as the Commission shall prescribe, and remain in force not exceeding two years—unless suspended or set aside in a suit brought against the Commission in the circuit court of the United States, sitting as a court of equity, for the district wherein any carrier plaintiff in said suit has its principal operating office, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the circuit courts of the United States to hear and determine any such suit whether the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights of the carrier secured by the Constitution.

Mr. President, that ought to be satisfactory to the railroads. There is no need for making any additions to it. There may be, and in a sense there is, a technical distinction between rights specifically secured by the Constitution and rights that are founded purely in statutory provisions or in the general principles of the common law. But as applied to cases ordinarily arising out of the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission a distinction of that kind would be a distinction without a practical difference; and if this amendment should be adopted there would be no occasion to apply it. Under this bill the only action a carrier would ordinarily institute against the Commission would be to have the court determine whether a rate prescribed by that body was a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate, or whether a regulation prescribed was a just, fair, and reasonable regulation. This amendment provides that the court may determine "whether the order complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights secured by the Constitution."

No express prohibition is put upon the jurisdiction of the court against extending its inquiry to any limit. If the amendment is to be considered as intended to restrict the jurisdiction of the court, it can have that effect only by inference, on the theory that if a particular jurisdiction be expressly conferred by statute, the statute shall be so construed as to exclude any further or additional jurisdiction. But, Mr. President, so far as this amendment is concerned there is no need of wrestling with refinements of that character. It is broad enough to meet every requirement of the railroads. If a carrier complainant can show to the court that a rate prescribed by the Commission was confiscatory or not even compensatory; if it could show that the returns under the rate prescribed did not afford a fairly remunerative return for the capital invested and for the time and labor expended, would it not be depriving the carrier of its property, under the pretense of public authority, "without due process of law" or "just compensation?" The forms of law can not be used to wantonly destroy the property of citizens or the fruits of their labor. If the Constitution is not competent to protect the citizen against a wrong so monstrous, it should be amended without delay.

But aside from the Constitution, how would the statute operate if this bill, with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, should be enacted? It would provide that the Commission should have authority, after certain preliminary findings, to prescribe what would "in its judgment be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate" to be charged, and to prescribe what should be a "just, fair, and reasonable" regulation to be followed. If the Commission should prescribe a rate which was confiscatory or noncompensatory or not fairly remunerative, or prescribe a practice which was unjust, unfair, and unreasonable, would they not exceed the authority conferred upon them? True, the bill says they may prescribe a rate which "in their judgment" is just, reasonable, etc., and from this it may be argued that the law would vest a discretion in the board which the courts could not disturb, no matter how unwisely that discretion might be exercised. But I do not believe that a mere executive discretion could be so exercised as to defeat not only the manifest spirit of the law, but its very letter. The Congress themselves could not directly establish a confiscatory rate, and if the Congress could not themselves directly destroy the property of a carrier, they can not do so indirectly by investing an administrative body with a discretionary power to do it.

Justice Miller once said, in one of his great opinions, that the forms of law could not be used to rob the citizen under the pretense of levying taxes; neither can they be used to rob him under any pretense. And so I repeat that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas does not restrict the jurisdiction of the courts to a degree that should make it obnoxious to the railroads.

Mr. President, if this were not a matter of serious import, this performance would be diverting. If this amendment is to be adopted and incorporated in the bill, what is all this hullabaloo which has vexed us so long about? While the bill was still pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee, the papers contained daily accounts of the bold and implacable opposition the junior Senators from Iowa and Minnesota were making to the insertion of any provision whatever for a judicial review of the orders of the Commission. And the papers told us, also, of the pathetic, albeit defiant, dispatches sent by the revered and venerable Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] from a health resort down somewhere among the magnolias and orange blossoms of the far Southland to the Senators from Iowa and Minnesota to stand pat for the bill as it came from the House. The papers told us, also, of a stirring scene which occurred in the committee when the Senator from Iowa bearded the committee in its den and moved to report the House bill to the Senate without amendment. It is a pity that that scene can not be reproduced on canvas. It was historical and inspiring, or might have been. I doubt if it can be made so now. After events have robbed it of its glamour.

The motion of the Senator from Iowa was adopted by the committee by the votes of all the Democrats and the three Republicans I have named. Thereupon, according to newspaper accounts, the accuracy of which no one has disputed, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] said that as this was a Democratic measure, not a Republican measure, and as it had been carried through the committee by Democratic votes, he would move that it be reported to the Senate by the senior Democratic member of the committee [Mr. TILLMAN], and that motion prevailed. Then a war cry, not quite so resonant as of old, but still defiant, issued from the White House. The President, as he is accustomed to do on great occasions, forthwith summoned the newspaper correspondents to his august presence, and through them informed the country that he would stand resolutely and unshaken for the House bill and against any amendment authorizing a court review of the orders of the Commission; and this he would do though the heavens fell. As the press pictured him he stood before the country as grim and immovable as old Horatius at the bridge. Since then, however, whisperings have come of caucuses, concessions, and compromises. Those of little faith took on a prophetic aspect and smiled, while those of great faith still avowed their confidence in the unyielding firmness of the iron man at the White House. But those of little faith were the wiser. The President's abject surrender has justified their prophecies. If this amendment proposed by the President, through the Senator from Kansas, contains anything the railroads do not want, it will require the superfine acumen of a lawyer as versatile and obliging as the present Attorney-General, who has O. K.'ed the amendment, to point it out. Although not quite all they want, the very proposal of that amendment was a triumph for the senior Senators from Rhode Island and Ohio [Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. FORAKER] and their party coadjutors. But it affords a sad and sorrowful example of a Presidential fiasco. However, it is only another instance of our mighty man of destiny and duty backing away after one of his spectacular grand-stand performances. We may all be sorry, but we have no reason to be surprised.

DEMOCRATIC POSITION.

In saying this I may be accused of injecting partisanship into this discussion, thereby disturbing that sweet spirit of harmony which has been so often invoked during the course of this debate. The Senate has been repeatedly warned that this is a purely economic and not a party measure, and that all party considerations should be eschewed. Mr. President, despite this warning I feel obliged to say that this measure has party aspects as well as economic aspects which can not be ignored. The tariff question, the money question, and other questions of like import are as much economic questions as the one before the Senate; nevertheless these questions have not only divided parties, but they have given rise to some of the most terrific political combats in our history. The Democratic party in national convention twice declared specifically in favor of Congress enacting legislation for the regulation of railroad transportation, but never has the Republican party spoken on the subject. During the last two or three great party struggles for national supremacy the candidates of the Democratic party, giving voice to their party platforms, spoke in favor of this character of legislation; but the Republican candidates, although voluble upon other subjects, were silent as to this. The senior Senator from Rhode Island, who is in the foremost rank of Republican leaders, denounced this measure before the Interstate Commerce Commission as a Democratic measure, and because it was so considered by a majority of the Republican members of that committee, its management on the floor of the Senate was committed to a Democratic Senator; and that there might be no mistake about it, it was committed to the capable hands of that soft-spoken and gentle-tempered Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is everywhere known as the especial bête noire of the President. [Laughter.] The President took up this Democratic measure in the belief that he could carry it through, and thus add to his prestige and popularity; but the pressure upon him has been greater than his power of resistance, and so his commendable attempt to appropriate a Democratic policy has proved abortive. Into the ear of the trusting people he breathed the promise of relief, but he has broken it to their hope. Everyone now knows, what many knew at the inception of this crusade, that if effective legislation of this character is really desired the Republican party can not be depended upon to enact it.

PENALTIES.

Mr. President, one other thing, and I am done. Prior to the act of February 19, 1903, known as the "Elkins Act," punishment for the violation of the interstate-commerce law was provided not only for railroad corporations themselves, but the law also provided for the punishment, by both fine and imprisonment, of the officers and agents of such corporations who should knowingly and willingly do or cause to be done, or suffer or permit to be done, any act or thing prohibited by the law. The Elkins Act repealed so much of the penal clauses of the existing law as authorized imprisonment as a punishment.

Mr. President, until those clauses are restored, and the danger of a prison cell is set before the eyes of offending officers, I doubt if many of the great corporations will be much alarmed by the remaining penalties. If the fine for a violation of the law is less than the profit realized out of the criminal transaction, it stands to reason that risks will be taken. But the gloom, the odor, and the shame of a prison is a more serious thing, and there can be no doubt as to its deterrent effect. A corporation can act only through its officers and agents. The insensate, incorporeal thing called a "corporation" is itself incapable of criminality. The real criminal is the man who acts for it and violates the law. A fine imposed on him, we may be sure, is in some way, directly or indirectly, ultimately paid out of the corporation treasury. Such a punishment, therefore, has in it nothing of terror and little of restraint. But fear of the jailer appalls the criminal and tempers his courage with discretion. The battle the beef-trust magnates fought at Chicago the other day was not to save their corporations from a fine, but their persons from a cell. When they succeeded in unloading their personal delinquencies on their corporation treasuries they congratulated themselves and each other on their victory. I know it has been said that the imprisonment clauses of the penal sections of the law are difficult of enforcement. That may be true, but they are not incapable of enforcement unless the courts are either impotent or too complaisant.

Mr. President, if the majority here desire to enact an effective rate regulation law, the penal clauses of the old law as they existed prior to the passage of the Elkins Act should be restored. Every honest, conscientious railroad official who wants to obey the law would approve that action. Only those who would treat the law and public authority with contempt would protest.

Finally, Mr. President, I desire to say that the pending measure is essentially a business measure, with far-reaching effects on the commercial interests of the country. It should be disposed of with great deliberation and without passion or prejudice. The rights and interests of all concerned should be guarded with equal care. But if we pass any bill at all—and undoubtedly one should be passed—it should be sufficiently comprehensive, and at the same time sufficiently restrictive and drastic, to accomplish the purposes intended. Unless we succeed in accomplishing what we attempt, we had better not have made the attempt at all.

Mr. DOLLIVER obtained the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire at the first convenient time to reply to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], but the notices of intention to speak show that the time will be occupied, as I am now advised, until Tuesday. In order that no other notices may displace or delay the answer which I desire to make to those Senators, with the permission of the Senate, I give notice that next Tuesday, which is the first available day, I will endeavor to reply to the arguments of those Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Notice will be entered.

ESTATE OF JAMES STALEY, DECEASED.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. As the Senator from Iowa desires to occupy some little time, I ask him to yield to me for a moment, as I should like to go away.

Mr. DOLLIVER. With pleasure.

Mr. STONE. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. 12286) granting relief to the estate of James Staley, deceased. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Claims, and involves four hundred and some odd dollars. I should like to have it considered and passed now. A similar bill has been reported several times by committees of the two Houses. The need of passing it now is this: A settlement has been made by the Auditor of the Treasury Department, and he is holding it in suspense until this matter can be adjusted. If perchance it should be wound up and the books balanced, the passage of the bill would be of no value.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to allow Bertha D. Staley, administratrix of the estate of James Staley, deceased, credit in the sum of $475.63, in the settlement of his accounts while superintendent Indian training school, Yankton Agency, S. Dak., and special disbursing agent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TOWN SITES IN CONNECTION WITH IRRIGATION PROJECTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 87) providing for the withdrawal from public entry of lands needed for town-site purposes in connection with irrigation projects, under the reclamation act of June 17, 1902, and for other purposes, which were, on page 1, line 10, after "be," to insert: "Appraised under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and;" on the same page, line 10, after "sold," to insert: "under his direction;" on page 2, line 12, to strike out "the" and insert "public;" on the same page, line 13, after "purposes," to strike out "for which they were reserved;" and to strike out all of section 4 and insert:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, in accordance with the provisions of the reclamation act, provide for water rights in amount he may deem necessary for the towns established as herein provided, and may enter into contract with the proper authorities of such towns, and other towns or cities on or in the immediate vicinity of irrigation projects, which shall have a water right from the same source as that of said project for the delivery of such water supply to some convenient point, and for the payment into the reclamation fund of charges for the same to be paid by such towns or cities, which charges shall not be less nor upon terms more favorable than those fixed by the Secretary of the Interior for the irrigation project from which the water is taken.

To strike out all of section 5 and insert:

SEC. 5. That whenever a development of power is necessary for the irrigation of lands under any project undertaken under the said reclamation act, or an opportunity is offered for the development of power under any such project, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to lease for a period not exceeding ten years, giving preference to municipal purposes, any surplus power or power privilege, and the moneys derived from such leases shall be covered into the reclamation fund and be placed to the credit of the project from which such power is derived: Provided, That no lease shall be made of such surplus power or power privilege as will impair the efficiency of the irrigation project.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I have listened with very great attention and pleasure to the speech of the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and I do not rise now for the purpose of replying to it, for the reason that in the main the Senator's researches have brought him to the same conclusions that have influenced my own opinions. I am inclined to think that while in the main the analysis of the Senator from Missouri of the jurisdiction of the courts under the House bill and under the amendment which has been offered to that bill by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] is correct, a slight element of misunderstanding enters into his statement.

I have held from the beginning that the House bill is so framed that the courts have under it exactly the jurisdiction which the Constitution gives them. I have considered the fixing of a railroad rate through the Commission as an act of Congress. I can find no authority in the Constitution for the exercise of the power to regulate interstate commerce except that power which is conferred upon the Congress; and I have been driven by long meditation to the conclusion that whatever else this order of the Commission is, it is an act of Congress; for Congress has the only power conferred by the Constitution to regulate commerce between the States.

Now, if that is so, the relation of the courts to that order is a fixed relation; exactly the relation which the courts have to every other act of Congress; namely, the jurisdiction, when the validity of the act is attacked in a proper proceeding, to pass upon the question whether it is within the constitutional power of Congress.

There is no limitation whatever in the Constitution of the United States upon the power of Congress to regulate Congress, except the limitation of the Constitution itself. I hold, therefore, that my honorable friend the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] in offering an amendment conferring affirmatively upon the circuit courts of the United States the jurisdiction which that amendment confers, does not enlarge or abridge in any way the jurisdiction which the circuit courts would have under the House bill without any amendment at all. While that is my conviction, I agree entirely with the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] who, finding good lawyers putting these views in controversy, says: "I am perfectly willing to state affirmatively in the bill what I have maintained from the beginning it was the intention of the bill to include or at least not to exclude."

I have risen for a different purpose. Much has been said—some of it with marked solemnity and seriousness and some with evident appreciation of the humor which is supposed to be involved in it—about the interference of the President of the United States in the work of the Senate. Nobody denies that the President has a certain relation to the legislative business of the Government of the United States. At any rate, if there ever was an excuse given to the President of the United States to publicly explain his views and opinions, it has been given by the course of this debate.

On last Saturday my distinguished friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], responding to a request, or a suggestion, I suppose, of the legislature of that State calling upon him to support the President, wrote a letter that he was supporting the President, and proved it by quoting from the President's message that he desired the proceedings of the Commission to be subject to judicial review. And only this morning a famous newspaper printed an extract from the President's message, and denounced the amendment of my honorable friend the Senator from Kansas on the ground that it was in violation of the President's views and attitude upon this question.

I am not one of those who have been irritated by the interest which the President of the United States has taken in this controversy. His interest has been upon the broadest and highest national ground. He has stated his views and convictions to the American people in every section of the country, and not one line can be attributed to him having in it the trace of a partisan outlook upon this great national question. Therefore whatever interest he has taken in it can certainly not be attributed to a partisan design of any kind or character.

I have been familiar for a good many years with the attitude of the executive department of the Government toward the work of Congress. There is a member of the Senate now who, if he were disposed to give his experience, would be able to verify what I say, that it has been for many years the no uncommon practice for the Congress of the United States to take counsel with the Executive Departments in perfecting great acts of national legislation. There are at least five acts of legislation, all of them referring to this and similar questions, that were put through both Houses of Congress in the last five years practically without change, as they came from the office of the Attorney-General of the United States.

In the present controversy the Attorney-General has certainly had the invitation of the legislative branch of the Government to take an interest in this matter. Among the very first things the Committee on Interstate Commerce did was to invite him to give his opinion in writing to the committee explaining to us our powers and making what suggestions he thought desirable in relation to this legislation. It is a difficult, a complex, an almost impenetrable subject with which we have been called upon to deal, and I do not propose to be disparaged or to allow anybody else to be disparaged by a sneering suggestion that we have consulted the Attorney-General or even the President of the United States. I count it just as respectable and just as perfectly in line with my public duty to take council with the President of the United States on these questions as for my colleagues and for others to hold sweet counsel with the presidents of railroad corporations.

Mr. President, I do not propose to submit, without at least a word of protest, to the suggestion that the President of the United States is delivering over this bill to the tender mercies of its enemies. It is a nonpartisan proposition. It has friends on both sides of this Chamber, good friends on both sides of this Chamber. It has possibly enough to perfect the legislation and put it through in an effective and satisfactory form. But whether or not it has that number of members of the Senate in favor of it, its friends do not propose to surrender any principle that is involved in it. They have had a long and arduous fight, and they are ready for a good many years of fighting yet. I undertake to say here that if the Senate of the United States does not conform this measure to the petition of those who have supported it by the million throughout the United States we do not settle this question. Unless the effective legislation which is demanded by the American people is given by the Congress of the United States, instead of settling this issue we merely create the largest national issue with which this generation will have to deal.

Mr. President, there is not a line in the public or private writings of the President of the United States to warrant the suggestion that any man is supporting him or supporting the ideas to which he has given expression during the last two years by so amending this bill as to transfer this power of Congress to the courts of the United States. The newspaper to which I alluded a moment ago printed an extract from one of the President's speeches, and followed it with a denunciation of the amendment which my friend the Senator from Kansas introduced yesterday, leaving the impression upon the public mind, with a curious mixture of sincerity and satire, that the President of the United States had either changed his position or had never occupied any such position as he would be put in by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Fortunately in connection with the President's messages we have some outside knowledge of what his notions and his ideas have been in respect to these matters, because with a freedom which has been characteristic of his public career, and I think a very admirable part of his idea of public duty, he has taken the American people into his confidence in every section of the United States. It is true that in his message he suggested that the orders of the Commission were to be subject to the review of the courts, and if I have correctly interpreted the purpose of the honorable Senator from Kansas in introducing his amendment, it was for the purpose of defining before the American people exactly what sort of a review the friends of this legislation desire to have.

Not one of them desires to leave this railroad property without redress against a violation of constitutional rights. Not one of them desires an act of oppression or injustice against these carriers, whether committed in malice or through error, to go without a proper redress in the courts of the United States.

The President of the United States in his annual message asked that these orders be made "subject to review in the courts." But for months before that he had been explaining to the American people exactly what jurisdiction he thought the courts should occupy in the matter, and I desire to take the opportunity of putting into the RECORD an extract from a speech made by the President before a Democratic club in the city of Chicago—the Iroquois Club—some time before the last message to Congress was sent, which, in my humble judgment, shows that the President occupies now exactly the position he occupied then, and exactly the position which he explained in his brief recommendation to Congress last December upon this subject. He said:

> Personally, I believe that the Federal Government must take an increasing control over corporations. It is better that that control should increase by degrees than that it should be assumed all at once. But there should be, and I trust will be, no halt in the steady progress of assuming such national control. The first step toward it should be the adoption of a law conferring upon some executive body the power of increased supervision and regulation of the great corporations engaged primarily in interstate commerce of the railroads. My views on that subject could not have been better expressed than they were expressed yesterday by Secretary Taft in Washington, and as they were expressed by the Attorney-General in his communication to the Senate committee a couple of weeks ago: "I believe that the representatives of the nation—that is, the representatives of all the people—should lodge in some executive body the power to establish a maximum rate, the power to have that rate go into effect practically immediately, and the power to see that the provisions of the law apply in full to companies owning private cars and private tracks just as much as the railroads themselves. The courts will retain, and should retain, no matter what the Legislature does, the power to interfere and upset any action that is confiscatory in its nature."

Again, in his speech delivered before the Chamber of Commerce of Denver only a few months before the sending of the President's last message to Congress, he used these words:

> But with that statement as a preliminary, I wish to urge with all the earnestness I possess, not only upon the public, but upon those interested in the great railway corporations, the absolute need of acquiescence in the enactment of such law. As has been well set forth by the Attorney-General, Mr. Moody, in his recent masterly argument presented to the committee of the Senate which is investigating the matter, the legislators have the right, and, as I believe, the duty, to confer these powers upon some executive body. It can not confer them upon any court, nor can it take away the court's power to interfere if the law is administered in a way that amounts to confiscation of property.

So, from the beginning the President has been clear and straight in his interpretation of his situation, and I doubt very much whether it would have been necessary for him to address these speeches to the country or to take the slightest interest, with those who have been trying, amid a good many difficulties, to perfect legislation, if it were not for the fact that persistently the argument for a review of the orders of the Commission and a trial of the case de novo in the courts, from the beginning of this debate, has taken refuge behind six words in the President's message, to wit, that the order of the Commission should be subject to review in the courts.

I submit in all fairness that it is hardly proper for men who know exactly what the President of the United States has stood for, exactly what he is trying to do, whether they indorse it or not—it is hardly proper to deal with the American people with the idea that they are supporting the President, when in point of fact they are urging a proposition that is not only not contained in anything the President has ever said, but reduces the President's recommendation to a practical and legal absurdity before the whole country.

I have spoken in this way, Mr. President, not for the purpose of irritating anybody's feelings. I know that much is said here in the Senate about Executive interference, but I close by suggesting that the institutions and legislation of the American people are much more liable to be damaged here in the Senate of the United States by interference from other quarters than by the friendly and patient suggestions of the President of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I belong to that very small class of Senators and Representatives who do not believe that it is proper for them to be influenced in the performance of their legislative duties by the views of the executive department; and it has never been my practice since I had the honor to occupy a seat in Congress to confer with any President, either of my own or of the opposition party, in respect to any legislation.

The only exception I ever made—and that more apparent than real—was in the case of the lamented and martyred McKinley, whose invitation I accepted to confer with him in the hope that we might find a way to avert the war with Spain. Upon a question like that, which was not legislative, I felt that any Member of Congress might properly confer with the Executive of the Republic. But, sir, I have so often seen—and this applies not only to the present President of the United States, but to his predecessors in that great office—I have so often seen the judgment of Congress overruled or controlled by Executive influence that early in my service in the other House I resolved that it should never prevail with me.

I remember when a mere school boy reading of a great Virginia Democrat being invited to the White House by a President, of his own party and chosen from his own State, to confer upon an important question pending in the Congress, and I remember how my youthful blood was made to run faster when I read how that great Virginia Democrat said: "Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States has separated the executive and the legislative departments of this Government, and, by the help of God, I intend to keep them separate." I adopted that as my creed and I have lived up to it from that day to this.

But I must say if ever a President was justified in conferring with his friends in Congress, this measure and these circumstances furnish that justification. Earnestly and, as I believe, sincerely striving to put upon the statute book a useful measure, he finds himself confronted with the opposition of his own party. I am safely within the truth when I say that less than one-third of the President's party friends in this Chamber sympathize with this effort to secure the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island is going to include himself in that one-third who help the President.

Mr. ALDRICH. So far as I know, there is no Senator sitting upon this side who does not sympathize fully with the Senator from Texas and the President of the United States in a desire to secure effective and proper legislation with reference to the regulation of railroad rates. That a large part of the Senators on this side do not sympathize either with the President or with the junior Senator from Iowa in an attempt and purpose to so limit and circumscribe the rights of the people of the United States that they can not be effectively secured through the courts of the country I will frankly admit.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island always knows exactly what he wants, but he sometimes makes the mistake of supposing that other people do not also know what he wants. I know that a large number of Republican Senators honestly believe that this legislation is unnecessary, and another per cent of gentlemen on that side honestly believe that it will be hurtful. I have no quarrel with them, if that is their honest opinion; and I am one of the men who believe and who dare to say, in spite of all the slanders that fill the air, that a large majority of the men in this body want to do what they think is right. I accord to others the same honesty of purpose and motive that I claim for myself, but it is no impeachment of their patriotism to say that they differ with the President, and their differences with him, I repeat, make it permissible, if it can ever be permissible, for the Executive to seek conferences with the members of the legislative department.

Now, Mr. President, one expression by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] gives me even more concern than the open admission that the President has been striving by conference and suggestion to shape the legislation of Congress on this subject. The Senator from Iowa says that those who have conferred with the President have rendered the country a better service than others who have been conferring with the presidents of railroads. I cordially agree to that statement. But, Mr. President, the Senate is entitled to know who it is here who has been conferring with the presidents of the railroads. If any Senator here has been conferring with the railroads or the presidents of the railroads, with a view to defeating legislation in the public interest, the Senate is entitled to know it, and the country is entitled to know it.

The Senator from Iowa is not given to intemperate or incautious speech, and when he suggests that Senators who are striving to accomplish the defeat of this bill are consulting with the presidents of railroads with a view to that end, just as he and others who are striving to pass it are consulting with the President of the United States with a view to that end, he utters a serious reflection upon some Senators—not upon the Senate, because no man believes that such conferences as that include the Senate. But if they include any Senator or any Senators, the country and the Senate are entitled to know who these Senators are.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has only anticipated what I wanted to say. As the Senator from Texas has well said, the charge—for it is not anything short of that—that Senators who are in opposition to the bill he is supporting are in conference here from time to time with presidents of railroads——

Mr. ALDRICH. With a view of defeating the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. With a view of defeating the bill is a most serious one, and the Senators referred to should be named. I respectfully demand of the Senator from Iowa that he name the Senators, so that if there is a member of this body engaged in such conferences we may know who it is.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I shall take the liberty of not pursuing that controversy.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, Mr. President, it seems to me the Senate has a right to know. I do not imagine the Senator refers to me, but I do know, as every other Senator must know, that the suggestion of the Senator was broad enough to include every member of this body.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have never dreamed that there was any impropriety in consulting with presidents of railroads. I presume hardly a man here but has sought the counsel and suggestion of those who were practically familiar with railway business. In connection with my honorable friend from Ohio, I spent three months last spring hearing the views of as distinguished a group of railroad managers as ever assembled anywhere in the world, and I have never thought that a man could not talk with railroad presidents without being charged with some form of impropriety. I have no notion that a man can be guilty of the offense of consulting with the Chief Magistrate of the American people without being made the subject of ridicule and misconstruction of his motive.

Mr. FORAKER. I have never complained of anyone who has seen fit to confer with the Chief Magistrate of the nation. I do so whenever I see fit to and he will permit it. I am always glad to do it. I never think of anyone conferring with the President having any improper motive in view.

So far as conferences with railroad presidents are concerned, I do not know of any on the part of any member of this body. It is true that when the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce had hearings, covering five or six weeks last spring, a number of railroad officials appeared before that committee and gave their testimony, just the same as any other witnesses; but I do not know of any member of the committee conferring with those railroad officials at that time. I do not know of any member of that committee or any member of this body conferring at any time or place with any railroad official concerning this proposed legislation.

Now, Mr. President, it will not do for the Senator to say he had no thought or purpose of insinuating that there was anything improper in such conferences, for the Senator said in so many words that Senators had been conferring with railroad presidents in order that they might better know how to defeat this legislation. Only one inference could be drawn from that, and that was that men who do not agree with the Senator from Iowa in his support of this measure were representing in some such way as has been charged railroad interests or railroad officials. I know of no railroad officials having anything whatever to do with this legislation, except only to express their views when they came before the committee. No railroad official, so far as I can recall, has ever talked with me at any time or any place, and I do not believe that any railroad official has ever talked in any improper way with anybody else who is in opposition to this proposed legislation.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I saw in the newspapers a day or two ago a statement that President Mellen, of one of the New England roads—I have forgotten which—had been to the White House for lunch, conferring with the President about this matter, and rumor had it that he went there to demand that certain features of the Hepburn bill should be stricken out—that part of the bill which relates to requiring the railroads to keep a certain kind of books and no other kind.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator will pardon me, I should like, as one witness, to give some little testimony in this interesting controversy among the brethren on that side as to what took place at the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee. I can not recall the date, but I recollect very distinctly that a gentleman came into the committee room and, after shaking hands with a few of his friends, passed on to the inner sanctuary, and I did not see him any more; but I was afterwards informed that he was Mr. A. J. Cassatt, of the Pennsylvania road. Now, what his business was or with whom he conferred I do not pretend to say. I merely state that as a fact.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not know anything about the occasion to which the Senator refers. I never met Mr. Cassatt but once in my life, and I met him at the White House then. He was there calling upon the President.

Mr. President, let me call attention to the fact in this connection, now that Mr. Cassatt has been named in the way he has, that he is one of the railroad presidents of the country who has been favoring this proposed rate making on the part of the Government for the railroads of the country, and Mr. Mellen, who was referred to, is another. They have been advocates of this kind of legislation all the while. There are railroads on both sides of the question. At least, such is the report as to Mr. Cassatt and Mr. Mellen.

I have very frequently seen notices of their presence in the city, but never having seen Mr. Cassatt but the one time, of course I do not know what he was here for, except only as the newspapers may have advised. I never met Mr. Mellen; I do not know him at all; but I have noticed that he has been here frequently and that at such times he was usually in conference with the President, and always about railway rate legislation.

I can understand, Mr. President, why Mr. Cassatt, representing the Pennsylvania Railroad, might favor this kind of legislation. He represents a railroad that covers the heart of the country; a railroad so situated and so powerful, having so many advantages, that it could grow inordinately rich on what might destroy other railroad properties. I do not know of anybody else equally fortunately situated. If anybody else is so equally fortunately situated, it is Mr. Mellen and his road; and they are both in favor of this kind of legislation.

But, Mr. President, I do not imagine that either of these gentlemen, or that any other railroad official, has been in Washington to see the President or to see any Senator in regard to railway rate legislation with any improper motive in view. I do not know why they should not come here when their great properties are being legislated about and give us the benefit of their special knowledge. I know I was very glad to hear them when they came before the Interstate Commerce Committee. They were able men, intelligent men, and they gave us information that it was necessary for us to have to enable us to intelligently legislate; and I have no doubt they have been able to give the President a great deal of information that has been appreciated by him.

What I object to is that the Senator from Iowa or any other Senator should stand up here in this body and refer to a circumstance of that kind in such a way as that people might rightfully deduce from his statement that it was intended by him to charge that improper influences were being exerted, and that Senators were yielding to such improper influences. That is an attack on the whole Senate, and should not be made unless based on facts. That is all I care to say about that.

Mr. President, the Senator alluded to something entirely personal to myself. He said that on last Saturday I sent to the legislature of Ohio a letter, in which I undertook to claim that I was supporting the President in contending here for an adequate court review. I do not suppose that what I said to the Ohio legislature on that occasion is a matter of much importance to Senators, but I should like, not troubling Senators to stop and listen to it, to have what I did say inserted in the RECORD, so that along with that statement of the Senator from Iowa those who may see fit to read the RECORD can read and see what I did say. Therefore I send to the Secretary's desk a copy of that letter as it was published in the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, unless Senators desire that it shall be read, but I do not suppose that the Senate does so desire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the paper referred to by the Senator from Ohio will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The paper referred to is as follows:

[Special dispatch to Commercial Tribune.]

"YOU CONFIRM MY OPINION," FORAKER WRITES ASSEMBLY—SAYS HIS COURSE ON RATE REGULATION IS IN ACCORD WITH LEGISLATURE'S EXPRESSED WISHES AND MEASURES—QUOTES TAFT'S AKRON AND COLUMBUS WORDS—SHOWS HOW ADMINISTRATION HAS STOOD FOR COURT REVIEW.

COMMERCIAL TRIBUNE BUREAU, OUTLOOK BUILDING,
Columbus, Ohio, March 31, 1906.

In a letter answering the request of the general assembly that he support the position of President Roosevelt on the railroad rate question Senator FORAKER exhaustively explains his own position.

The letter was drawn out by the O'Roard resolution.

Senator FORAKER'S colleague, Senator DICK, wrote to the Ohio assembly, indorsing the sentiment of the O'Roard resolution.

SENATOR FORAKER'S LETTER.

Senator Foraker's letter is as follows:

The General Assembly of Ohio:

GENTLEMEN: I received by due course of mail your house joint resolution No. 8, passed February 23, 1906, of which the following is a copy:

"House joint resolution No. 8, relative to railroad rates.

"Be it resolved by the general assembly of Ohio, That the members of the general assembly of Ohio believe that President Roosevelt was right when he recommended to Congress that a law be passed 'conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it is found unreasonable and unjust, then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go, the "maximum reasonable rate," as it is commonly called, this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time, and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts.'"

"SEC. 2. That we commend the wisdom of such legislation by the Congress of the United States, and request the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from Ohio, in Congress, to vote for the passage of a law containing such provisions.

"SEC. 3. That copies of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives of Ohio, in Congress, by the secretary of state.

"C. A. THOMPSON,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.
"JAMES M. WILLIAMS,
"President pro tempore of the Senate.

"Adopted February 23, 1906."

WHY HE DELAYED ANSWER.

I have delayed answering until now, because I observed that you had under consideration a bill creating a railroad commission and empowering it to fix railway rates and prescribe railway regulations for Ohio.

It occurred to me that in the consideration of that measure you would find it necessary to consider and act upon some of the questions that have been discussed in the two Houses of Congress, and that it might be easier, after such action, to make answer to your request.

I now learn that the bill, with some amendments, has passed both houses, and that it will, no doubt, receive the approval of the governor and become a law.

CONTAINS AMENDMENT.

I have a copy of it as it passed the house, and find, upon examination, as I anticipated when I concluded to await your action, that it contains an amended provision, to which I shall call attention, that has been accepted by the senate without change, as I am informed.

But before pointing this out, allow me to say again, as I have repeatedly said heretofore in public utterances and in public print, that there is no difference of opinion upon the point that there are abuses practiced by the railroads that should be prohibited and remedied, nor is there any difference of opinion as to the necessity for some kind of additional legislation to accomplish this purpose.

The sole difference is as to what that legislation shall be.

TWO PROPOSITIONS ADVANCED.

Generally speaking, two propositions have been advanced: One to confer the rate-making power, as recommended by the President, on the Interstate Commerce Commission; the other to broaden and strengthen the jurisdiction and power of the courts under existing laws.

Many bills have been introduced embodying the former idea; a less number the second.

The first class of bills was intended by their respective authors to carry out the President's recommendation, and were supposed to be in full compliance with the requirements thereof; the second class aimed to accomplish the same purpose, but by different methods.

Out of all these many propositions finally came the so-called "Hepburn bill," which, according to the announcements in the newspapers, had the special approval of the President and his Attorney-General, and was to be supported as an Administration measure.

It passed the House without amendment, although there was much dissatisfaction expressed therewith by the Members of that body; was considered in the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, and, although there was much objection and discussion, all amendments were finally rejected and it was reported to the Senate, and is now under consideration as it came from the House.

It is earnestly and vociferously insisted that it shall now be passed by the Senate and become a law just as it passed the House.

Before commenting on this proposition, I call attention to the fact that the President, in his message of December 6, 1904, recommended that—

"The Commission (Interstate Commerce) should be vested with the power, where a given rate has been challenged and after full hearing found to be unreasonable, to decide, subject to judicial review, what shall be a reasonable rate to take its place, the ruling of the Commission to take effect immediately and to obtain unless and until it is reversed by the court of review."

HOW TAFT INTERPRETED.

Secretary Taft, in his speech as temporary chairman of the Ohio Republican State convention of May 24, 1905, interpreted this recommendation of the President and the Esch-Townsend bill, which had then passed the House of Representatives, as meaning that the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing rates and regulations, when made, shall be effective until set aside by judicial hearing.

In his speech at Akron, October 21, 1905, Secretary Taft further said:

"The President's proposition is that the power of the Commission shall be to hear a complaint that a particular rate is unreasonable, to declare it to be unreasonable, and to fix the rate which should be reasonable, and embody this finding in an order, which should stand until set aside by a court, either upon preliminary or final hearing."

WITH ROOSEVELT'S APPROVAL.

It is believed, upon what is thought to be good authority, that both these speeches of Secretary Taft were made with the knowledge and approval of the President as correctly setting forth his views.

In the Esch-Townsend bill, and in the interstate-commerce bill, framed by the Interstate Commerce Commissioners by them presented to the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate in November, 1905, and which was at the time supposed to be the most intelligent and authoritative presentation of the President's views, in the form of a bill, that could be framed, as well as in nineteen other bills that have since been introduced in the Senate and the House at this session of Congress, all, as their respective authors understood and believed, in substantial conformity in this respect with the President's recommendation, it was carefully provided in one form or another that the orders of the Commission fixing rates and prescribing regulations should be subject to review by the courts in proceedings instituted therefor by either the carrier, the shipper, or any other party interested, as to whether or not they were lawfully made in accordance with the terms and conditions of the proposed statute that they should be just and reasonable.

PROVIDED IN SIXTEEN STATES.

In every one of the sixteen States of the Union where railroad commissions or other officials have been authorized and empowered to fix rates and prescribe regulations, suitable provisions have been made for a review by the courts of all such orders.

Such was the previous discussion, and such the character of legislation on the subject in the different States, and such the character of all the bills that had been introduced when the Hepburn bill made its appearance.

Like all the other bills, it conferred the rate-making power, as recommended by the President, on the Interstate Commerce Commission, but unlike every similar statute enacted in the various States and unlike every other similar bill introduced in Congress, and in direct conflict with the utterances of the President and every other person who had spoken for him, it not only fails to provide for a review by the courts, but it is intentionally so drawn, as some of its leading advocates acknowledge, as to prohibit such a review, not only upon the petition of the carrier, but also upon the petition of the shipper or any other person or community interested or affected by the orders of the Commission.

ALL ELSE OVERSHADOWED.

This feature of the bill was so unexpected, so unprecedented, so un-American, and so in conflict with that rule of American life and American institutions that every man is entitled to his day in court, that every other question raised by the proposed legislation has been overshadowed and almost lost sight of in the debate that is now in progress.

Notwithstanding the acute character of this particular question, in some remarks I made to the Senate on the 28th of February I took occasion to discuss the general subject at length, pointing out as well as I could a number of the provisions of the bill that are, in my judgment, unconstitutional, and giving reasons why, in my opinion, the bill, if it should be enacted and be upheld by the courts, will prove a sore disappointment to all who are interested in securing such legislation, because of its manifest deficiencies as a remedy for any trouble of a serious character of which complaint has been made.

SENDS COPY OF SPEECH.

In view of your request, I have taken the liberty of sending a copy of these remarks to each member of your body, in order that all may know in full, if they so desire, the views I entertain, and the reasons for them, with respect to this measure, and with that purpose in mind I ask that those remarks may be considered by reference as a part of this communication.

It is unnecessary for present purposes to review those remarks further than to call attention to the fact that I have undertaken to show that if we enact the Hepburn bill as it passed the House we must encounter a number of the most serious constitutional and legal questions, on account of which the measure will probably perish in the courts, and that, if it should stand that test, the law will not prevent or in any manner remedy the practice of giving secret rebates, making discriminations among individual shippers, the lack of uniformity in classification, or the evil to communities of unjust and discriminatory relative rates.

HOUSE COMMITTEE ADMITS IT.

The House committee in its report admits and concedes all this, and acknowledges that it does not attempt to deal with these evils.

In those remarks I undertake not only to show these defects of the Hepburn bill, but also to point out, upon facts and testimony of an indisputable character, that by a simple amendment of the present law, which I have already introduced in the Senate, the existing remedial provisions of the statute can be so broadened and strengthened as to reach and effectively prevent all these abuses.

This amendment involves but one hearing, and that in the courts, in a proceeding in the name of the United States without trouble to the shipper, under a requirement that the courts shall proceed summarily to hear the complaint, postponing all other business, in so far as may be necessary to enable it to do so, thus avoiding all delays.

WILL BE MORE EXPEDITIOUS.

On this account this proceeding will be far more expeditious than the proceeding provided by the Hepburn bill.

It goes further and relieves the shipper of all expense of the litigation on account of which he has been heretofore so burdened and hampered, that, in many cases, he has preferred to suffer the wrongs to which he has been subjected rather than undertake, single handed and alone, to fight a railroad before the Commission or in the courts.

In addition to these advantages, which would be of incalculable value to the aggrieved shipper, the proceeding would be under a statute that has already been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States and under which more has been done to correct railroad evils than under any act of legislation that has yet been enacted by any of the States or the Federal Government.

NOTHING EXPERIMENTAL.

No constitutional or legal questions can arise, for all have been discussed and passed upon by the court of last resort. There would be, therefore, in such a proceeding nothing experimental.

I have been hoping that in some form or other this kind of legislation, which could not prove otherwise than effective, may be enacted; but assuming that the Hepburn bill in some form will be passed and become a law, I shall consider it my duty to do all in my power to make it a constitutional, workable, and effective measure.

My oath of office requires that, and I would not only violate that but also my duty to my constituents and the whole country if I were to do otherwise than follow its requirements.

CONFIRMS HIS OPINION.

With respect to this duty you have relieved me of all embarrassment by the action you have taken in adopting the amended provision above referred to as a part of the measure you have just passed, to provide for a full and complete review in the courts of the orders of the Commission you have created, for now, in view of your action, I feel confirmed in the opinion that it is my duty to insist upon such amendments to the Hepburn bill as a condition precedent to the support of it as will secure to carriers, shippers, communities, and all others who may be parties in interest affected by the orders of the Commission a right to appeal to the courts for a judicial determination of any questions that may arise involving or affecting their interests, for if such a provision is important in a State statute it requires no argument to show it is much more important in a statute that applies to the whole country.

THE PROPER INTERPRETATION.

I so conclude because this is necessarily and properly the interpretation you have placed upon the recommendation of the President, which you have quoted in your resolution.

Your action was, of course, taken intelligently, deliberately, and officially, but aside from the fact that it was taken in this intelligent and deliberate way is doubtless the further fact that, because of the equity and justice involved, you would not change your action even though the President might, for some reason sufficient for himself, see fit to change his own views with respect to such a provision, as it has been claimed, erroneously, I hope, he has done.

CONGRATULATES ASSEMBLY.

But however that may be, upon your action in adopting this amended provision I most heartily congratulate you and the people of Ohio, for by it you have, at an opportune time, fittingly rebuked the sentiment that would, if possible, excite distrust of the courts, destroy their usefulness, and debar them from their appropriate participation in the settlement of the great and far-reaching questions which legislation of this character must precipitate.

At the same time you have put Ohio in harmony with all her sister States and with the spirit of fair play that underlies and characterizes our Constitution and all our institutions of government.

With felicitations upon the near approach of the conclusion of your labors and upon the very creditable record you have made, I remain, with sentiments of highest esteem,

Very truly, yours, etc., J. B. FORAKER.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I think I ought not to allow this controversy to subside without disclaiming any intention in anything I have said to impute an improper motive to my good friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], or to any other member of this body. If I had thought to make such an imputation, I have had by far too much experience in this world to undertake to explode a proposition like that under these surroundings.

I have had no notion that a man might not properly consult with those familiar with the practical operations of the railway systems of the United States, here or anywhere. I have, with great industry, sought from original sources to get at the practical problems which are involved in the building and operation of our railway systems. That has been a part of every man's duty who has sought even to approach a clear understanding of the questions with which he has to deal.

So that instead of making an imputation upon a man's character because he is found consulting with persons more familiar than he himself was with these problems, I have felt from the beginning that it was my duty to do so. Otherwise I would not have stayed, in the midst of sickness and misfortune, for three months and far into the month of July here in this city, while others of my colleagues were peacefully resting at the summer resorts of Europe and America. I felt that to be my duty.

I have more than once expressed the opinion that the railway managers of the United States, these great and masterful men who have builded our railway systems, ought to deal at first hand with the Congress of the United States. I have been disappointed that the Government of the United States has been practically without the assistance of our great railway managers in the efforts which we have been making to perfect a practical scheme of railway regulation. I think it would have been of immense value to Congress if, instead of organizing a literary protest, running over a year in the United States and costing, as I am informed, nearly two millions of money, to befog the issues of this controversy, the great men who are interested in the management of our railway systems had personally given their attention to the problem with which Congress had to deal and coorpeated with the Government of the United States in the work which we have had in hand. The whole success of our legislation lies in the cooperation of the railway world with the act of Congress prescribing their duties and regulating their conduct.

The railway system of the United States is not an enemy of the American people. It is the household servant of American business. Its prosperity depends upon the prosperity of the American market place, and a lamentable tragedy in connection with this great matter has been the fact that, instead of aiding the Government of the United States, the men most interested in these great properties have at least acquiesced while a spirit of hostility and malice has grown up, in the midst of which we have been trying, under many disadvantages, to secure an act of effective legislation.

I desire, therefore, to disclaim any imputation upon the character of the honorable Senator from Ohio or of anybody else. I have not——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not take the Senator's remark as having any application to myself, and I so stated. I took exception to his remark because it affected the Senate as a body. Every member in it was included in the imputation, if I rightly understood the language employed by the Senator, and it was on behalf of the Senate itself as a whole that I took exception. I had no idea the Senator had any reference to myself. I know he did not refer to me, and am glad to learn that he did not refer to anybody else.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly not; and I would not have been disturbed in my mind in making even such a remark as I did if I had not found myself here on Tuesday in an atmosphere in which a friendly and earnest conference with the President of the United States in relation to a great practical question pending before the Congress of the United States, had not been made the subject of jest and sneer and satire, as if it were unbecoming and a reproach in some form to our institutions.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I wish once more to enter a protest, which I desire to make as emphatic as language can make it, against the assumption that any Senator here, or any person outside of this Chamber, is to be considered as the special friend and the only friend of railway rate legislation. I know of no right of monopoly by which anybody can assume that certain Senators here have a right to speak as friends of this legislation and certain other Senators are to be classified as its opponents. I mean to include in this Senators on both sides of this Chamber.

I know of no person who is here with an object to defeat legislation with reference to this matter. I trust we are all here to do our duty as Senators, having in view the importance of the subject and the traditions and the character of this great body, and that we are not to be classified arbitrarily as the friends or the opponents of any proposed legislation. I assume as has been so frequently stated, that this is an economic question and not a partisan question, about which there can be honest differences of opinion without reflections as to motives.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I want to add just one other word in answer to what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] last said about the character of the discussion that was engaged in on the floor of the Senate the day before yesterday when this conference was referred to. The talk about sneering satire and unkind remarks of one kind and another having been then indulged in, I do not remember anything of that kind. I remember there was a little good-natured raillery at the expense, if I may use that term without being misunderstood, in a certain sense, as we thought at the time, of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. It is so seldom that we get an opportunity to say anything to him or about him of a criticising character that we must be allowed to enjoy it when we do have such an opportunity. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. It was not the fact that there was a conference that lent interest to that colloquy, but that the Senator from Iowa was at the conference and admitted he was there without any qualification. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with the Senator further than to say a word.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to be necessary that somebody should have the last word in this controversy. I thought all the time in that good-natured colloquy—if that discussion between two or three Senators could be considered a colloquy—that it was at the expense of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. [Laughter.] Now they proclaim that it was at my expense. I supposed I was absolutely triumphant in that controversy [laughter], and that I went out of it with flying colors. But now the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] insists that I was worsted in that controversy. I am perfectly willing now, being in a forgiving mood, to admit that that colloquy and that little intervention was at my expense. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator takes it so good naturedly. It is not important whether it was at the expense of the Senator or at the expense of somebody else. I think everyone here was impressed more with the idea of the humor involved in the colloquy than in any criticism anybody may have been disposed to indulge in of the President or of anybody engaged in the conference with the President.

I have differed from the President about this rate-making proposition from the beginning. I have discussed it before the public and here in the Senate on numerous occasions; but I am sure the Senator will search in vain for one single word that I have ever uttered in regard to the President's attitude, except only it be a word of compliment and of regret that I could not be in accord with him in the views I entertain.

I have no question about the sincerity of the President. I think he is one of the most outspoken and aggressive men I have ever known, and I have never failed to so testify; but I think with respect to the President, as with respect to any other human being, he may possibly now and then be in error. I think he is in error in his recommendation in this respect, and I have felt it to be my duty to state wherein I was not able to agree with him. I am in full accord with him as to the necessity for some kind of legislation to break up and destroy and prevent for the future the abuses at the hands of the railroads that the people are now suffering from, but it does not necessarily follow that the right way to prevent those abuses is that pointed out by this Hepburn bill.

I have undertaken to show that it is an ineffective measure; that it is an unconstitutional measure; that it is not a workable measure; that is would be impracticable so far as results are concerned, and that if enacted there will be disappointments, and that for these reasons I do not think it wise legislation. Surely it is my right and my privilege to do that, and surely when a conference has been held, and it is made the subject of discussion in this body, I have a right to refer to that fact, no matter who was present, without being called to account for it, and without being charged, by innuendo or otherwise, with having committed the heinous offense of indulging in sneers or satire or with having been guilty of talking at some time with some railroad president or other official.

Now, Mr. President, I shall not on this occassion deal with the difference between the Senator from Iowa and myself as to the kind of legislation that should be enacted, but at an early day I hope to have an opportunity to do that, and I hope to have an opportunity to satisfy every Member of this body, whether I satisfy anybody else or not, that I have offered an intelligent scheme of legislation which, if enacted, will efficiently remedy all the evils that are complained of, and which will save us from encountering all the serious constitutional and other difficulties that have been pointed out in the course of this debate as to the bill before the Senate.

CHAMBERLAIN, S. DAK., LAND DISTRICT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. 15328) to approve certain final proofs in the Chamberlain land district, South Dakota; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I move that the House bill be placed on the Calendar in lieu of Calendar No. 2261, being the bill (S. 4635) to approve certain final proofs in the Chamberlain land district, South Dakota, as they are identical, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, House bill 15328 will be placed on the Calendar in lieu of Senate bill 4635, and the Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened; and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 6, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 5, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CELEBRATION OF BIRTH OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House, without objection, the following invitation.

The Clerk read as follows:

The American Philosophical Society has the honor to invite the House of Representatives to be represented at the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of its founder, Benjamin Franklin, to be held in Philadelphia, on April 17, 18, 19, and 20, 1906.

INDEPENDENCE SQUARE, November, 1905.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it will be laid upon the table. By authority of the concurrent resolution of the House and Senate, the Chair appoints the following committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. OLMSTED of Pennsylvania (chairman), Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, Mr. COUSINS of Iowa, Mr. WATSON of Indiana, Mr. FASSETT of New York, Mr. HOAR of Massachusetts, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. POU of North Carolina, Mr. RYAN of New York, and Mr. WATKINS of Louisiana.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE CASTOR AND REPRESENTATIVE PATTERSON OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the order made in the House March 7, 1906, be amended so as to read: That a session of the House be held on Sunday, April 22, 1906, and that the day be set apart for addresses on the lives, characters, and public services of Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR and Hon. GEORGE R. PATTERSON, late Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The order was agreed to.

TERMS OF CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURT IN ALABAMA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand under the order of the House in the debate yesterday there was a bill before the House upon which the previous question was ordered. I think the only question before the House is the question of the division on that proposition.

The SPEAKER. That is unfinished business. The Chair wishes to state that he received this morning a telegram apparently signed by the two Alabama judges, Judge Jones and Judge Toulmin, which the Chair desires to deliver to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WILEY].

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I received a similar telegram, and I rise to ask, the previous question having been ordered, if it would be in order to ask, as a courtesy to myself and to these gentlemen, the two judges in Alabama, that the telegram may be read to the House. I ask unanimous consent that the telegram be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the telegram signed by the two Alabama judges, addressed to the Speaker of the House, may be read at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say this: Yesterday the question was debated before the House. Many Members of the House do not understand it now. I would not object, of course, to the telegram being read by my colleague providing I have an opportunity to state my side of the case.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. I have no objection to that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in lieu of that I will ask unanimous consent that there may now be twenty minutes' debate, ten minutes on each side, and the gentleman from Alabama, my colleague [Mr. WILEY], can read the telegram.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for twenty minutes' debate, ten minutes on each side. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the telegram from the two Alabama judges be now read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the telegram be read in his time?

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MONTGOMERY, ALA., April 5, 1906.

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, the regular judge and the judge permanently designated under section 591 of the Revised Statutes, on account of the accumulation of business in the northern district of Alabama, beg leave to make the following statement to the House of Representatives: Both of us realize the needs of the southern division of the northern district and have done all in our power to take care of it. The real question is not so much what it needs, but whether, with the present available force of judges, any arbitrary time should be fixed for transacting the business there. Without more aid than available at present, one of us being judge of the middle district and the other judge of the southern district, it is impossible to apportion absolutely six months of open court to Birmingham, in the northern district, without putting it out of our power to properly adjust and attend to the business at Montgomery, Tuscaloosa, Selma, Anniston, Huntsville, and Mobile.

We are advised that the Senate bill, substituted for House bill 16802, will be put upon its passage to-morrow. We did not know that the Senate bill would be taken up in the Senate when it was, and the House bill before the Judiciary Committee of the House was reported to the House before there was opportunity to present objections to its practical operation. As neither bill is now before the Judiciary Committee, and both bills are in the possession of the House, we trust it is proper to address this communication to you as Speaker, and respectfully request that you bring it to the attention of the House before it acts upon the bill to-morrow.

The House and Senate bills, we understand, are identical. Neither bill gives greater power than the existing law for the designation of outside judges, or to force the attendance of the designated judges. The proposed bill substitutes the circuit justice for the circuit judge as the authority to make designations, which can be better done by the latter than the former, since the circuit judge is more conversant with local conditions. It selects the month of September for the beginning of one of the terms. The court formerly met in September and Congress changed the date at the instance of bench and bar, because of the unpleasant weather there at that period.

Within the past twelve months fourteen weeks of court have been held at Birmingham, the designated judge having just finished a month's term there yesterday, and the regular judge now holding court at Montgomery, going thence to Tuscaloosa. Some time since he ordered the setting of the docket at Birmingham, commencing in May, for more than two months' term of court there, which will give Birmingham six months' open court within the past twelve months. During the same period much equity and bankrupt business arising in Birmingham has been transacted in the middle district at Montgomery. Such results are all that can possibly be accomplished under the present bill. Nothing can be accomplished under it which can not better be effected without it, while an arbitrary provision as to a fixed time absolutely for one place will deprive us of much needed discretion and unnecessarily hamper the administration of justice in other localities. That bill will give no practical or permanent relief. We have done and will continue to do all that two judges can, under existing conditions at seven different places, for holding court. We respectfully submit, under these circumstances, that the pending bill ought not to pass.

With great respect, your obedient servants.

THOS. G. JONES.
HARRY T. TOULMIN.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to trespass upon the time, patience, or indulgence of the House with any extended remarks. The telegram just read states fully and accurately. I do not think the House fully understands the character, scope, or meaning of the pending bill, which, upon its face and in its title, is apparently a mild-mannered measure.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WILEY] allow me a question right there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. If I understand this bill, it requires that a court be held for six months in the year at Birmingham, and requires the judge to keep the court open whether the business is sufficient to warrant it or not?

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Yes, sir; that is the proposition, precisely stated.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no amendment or change, nothing that meets that situation except an absolute requirement, whether the other places of the district demand any court or not. Is that true?

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is that all there is of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. That is all, with the exception that it repeats in another clause the requirement that the judges shall assign a judge to hold court there under certain conditions. Those two things are in the bill. That last, of course, is a reenactment.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Now, Mr. Speaker, permit me to repeat that there are three Federal judicial districts in Alabama. The southern district is composed of about thirteen counties, over which Judge Toulmin presides, and who resides in the city of Mobile. Then there are the middle and northern judicial districts, together composed of some fifty-odd counties, presided over by Judge Thomas G. Jones, who resides in the city of Montgomery. In the middle and northern districts of Alabama there are five places designated by law for the holding of the district and circuit courts of the United States, to wit: Montgomery, in the middle district, and Anniston, Tuscaloosa, Birmingham, and Huntsville, in the northern judicial district.

The bill now under consideration makes it mandatory that the judge of the middle and northern districts shall hold court, or provide for the holding of court, for six calendar months, at Birmingham, in each year, whether or not there shall be business enough to justify the holding of such court; and it makes no provision for the holding of the circuit or district courts, for any designated period of time, at the four other places just named in the middle and northern districts, where court, under the law, is expected to be held—that is to say, at Montgomery, Anniston, Tuscaloosa, and Huntsville—the balance of the year, six months only being all the time remaining for holding court at said other places. It leaves the judge no time for recess, for rest, research, or recreation or health. It is an arbitrary fixing of time for one place. Now, it is provided that if the district judge can not hold court at Birmingham the supreme court judge for the fifth circuit shall assign an outside judge to hold court at Birmingham. There is no provision in the bill for such assignment of help anywhere else in these two districts. It goes without saying, therefore, that it is unjust to the other places in the middle and northern districts. Both of the judges of the Federal courts in Alabama protest against the passage of this bill. The Alabama delegation have never been in conference, and, so far as I know, have never been consulted as to its merits or demerits. My colleague [Mr. CLAYTON], who lives in the middle judicial district of Alabama, is not here. He is a member of the House Judiciary Committee. In his necessary absence the bill was rushed through the committee, and no notice given to the other Members of this body from Alabama of the pendency of the bill, or any opportunity afforded any one of us to make known our objections thereto or to amend the same in any particular. From all over my district protests and petitions come pouring in upon us against the enactment of this Senate bill into a law. Here is a telegram that my colleague from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] has just handed me to read:

OPELIKA, ALA., April 5, 1906.

Hon. WASH. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.:

If possible, prevent passage of UNDERWOOD'S United States court bill.

GEORGE P. HARRISON,
President Alabama Bar Association.

Here is another telegram which he has just placed in my possession, which I will read:

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., April 5, 1906.

Hon. G. W. TAYLOR,
Washington, D. C.:

Yours 29th received. Oppose bill. Reasons stated in letter.

HARRY T. TOULMIN.

Judge Toulmin, sender of this last telegram, is judge of the southern judicial district of Alabama. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that this bill came from the Senate, was brought in from the other end of the Capitol without any warning or notice or intimation to any Member from Alabama, so far as I know, except the gentleman who represents the Birmingham district [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. It is rank and palpable injustice to these two hard-working and honorable judges, and I myself feel constrained earnestly to protest against the passage of the bill.

The proposition, boiled down, is simply this and nothing more, to wit: That it is made imperative, mandatory, that Judge Jones shall hold or require to be held, court at Birmingham six calendar months in every year, regardless of the fact that there may not be a sufficient volume of business to justify such holding, and regardless, further, of any inconvenience or denial of the right of trial—of due process of law—to the people for whom the law has sought to make provision for the adjudication of their rights of life, liberty, and property at the four other places above mentioned in said middle and northern districts, viz, Montgomery, Anniston, Tuscaloosa, and Huntsville. So long as the law requires court to be held twice a year under one judge, it becomes manifestly a matter of profoundest concern to litigants and lawyers in all these other places outside of Birmingham as to how long a period of time court shall be kept open in these communities for the transaction of the public business—for the trial of causes. At Montgomery, my home town, the docket is burdened with business. Is it fair, equitable, considerate, reasonable, or just that Birmingham shall have the "lion's share" of the time—one-half of each year—which can possibly be devoted to all these five places, leaving only six calendar months to Montgomery, Anniston, Tuscaloosa, and Huntsville, even were it physically possible for a judge to hold court every day in a given year, Sundays excepted? The proposition is selfish, arbitrary, and unfair. It results necessarily that the other four places in these two districts will receive but little, if any, judicial attention. In this connection I beg leave to read the following from the resolutions recently adopted by the Montgomery, Ala., bar:

> A fixed provision as to the length of time court shall be held in any one of these places would put it out of the power of the regular judge, and such designated judges as can be had, to equitably apportion and regulate their services according to the needs of the several places in proportion to the litigation demanding attention there. We know that the Hon. Thomas G. Jones, the present judge of the two districts, has not spared himself, and has labored unceasingly, intelligently, ably, and impartially to meet, so far as is in the power of one man, the needs of the several places in the two districts, and fortunately has never been absent from sickness. As long as our Senators and Representatives can not procure the passage of a bill for a regular additional judge, our conviction is that it is far better not to attempt to remedy our trouble by insisting upon an absolute fixed period at any place, during which court shall be kept open there. Each place has the same right to insist upon a fixed time for keeping court open there corresponding to its needs, and any absolute period in which courts must be kept open at any one place ignores the others and would, in our opinion, be unwise and unjust.

I read, by permission, an extract from a letter just to hand from Judge Toulmin touching the bill under consideration, as follows:

> A bill to require, by an arbitrary arrangement, court to be held at Birmingham six months in one year is unwise, unnecessary, and unjust. It will not accomplish the objects sought to be attained—that is to say, any permanent and effectual relief on account of the accumulation of business—and will not, in fact, effect any more than is already being done under existing law. Moreover, an arbitrary arrangement of that sort is unjust to the judge or judges who hold court at Birmingham. It leaves no discretion in them, and serves only as a reflection, or to be construed as a reflection, on such judges.

And now, in conclusion, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read, as part of my remarks, the following resolutions just received from the Montgomery and Opelika bars:

MONTGOMERY, ALA., April 2, 1906.

The bar of Montgomery passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That we are opposed to the passage of House bill No. 16802, which fixes a six months' open session of court for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama.

"Resolved further, That our Senators and Representatives are hereby respectfully requested to oppose said bill.

"Resolved further, That the Representatives in Congress from the counties which compose this judicial district are hereby respectfully requested, if said bill be put upon its passage, to have inserted therein a similar provision as to the time for keeping courts open in the middle district.

"Resolved further, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are earnestly requested to make another effort to procure the passage of the bill recommended by the State Bar Association and by nearly all the local bars of the State for the appointment of an additional judge for these two districts, as we believe it is an absolute necessity and the only feasible or just remedy for the overcrowded state of the dockets, the business of which is constantly increasing.

"Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, the Department of Justice, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

"Resolved further, That the committee heretofore appointed by this bar to cooperate with other bars for the passage of the bill for an additional judge for the two districts be continued and directed to cooperate with other committees having a like purpose in view."

W. L. MARTIN, Chairman.
G. F. MERTINS, Secretary.

In accordance with the resolution, copies will be sent immediately to the members of the Judiciary Committee and to the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The bar of Opelika yesterday also passed strong resolutions in opposition to the Underwood bill. They were as follows:

To the Judiciary Committee of the Fifty-ninth Congress:

We, the undersigned, members of the bar at Opelika, in Lee County, Ala., desiring to express our opposition to the bill recently introduced in Congress by Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD in regard to the time of holding court in the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, do hereby petition Congress and your honorable committee not to pass said bill, as it would be unfair and unjust to the litigants in the other courts of the northern district of Alabama and to the litigants in the middle district of Alabama.

R. B. BARNES.
E. A. BURKE.
H. M. WILSON.
R. C. SMITH.
B. T. PHILLIPS.

C. A. L. SAMFORD.

The three members of the bar who did not sign were absent from the city.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House before I go to the merits of this bill that yesterday afternoon, after the House adjourned, I heard a rumor that some of the Members believe that this bill was introduced for the purpose of attacking Judge Jones because he had decided certain peonage cases in Alabama. I want to repudiate that statement here. There is no truth in it. I have no unkindly feelings toward Judge Jones. Neither has my district. Those peonage cases did not occur in north Alabama; they were not in my district; none of them were my constituents; we had nothing to do with it; it absolutely was no concern of ours, and we are simply favoring this bill because it is the last resort we have got to get relief for our courts. Now, the situation is this: There are three districts in Alabama, one the southern district—a very small district—presided over by Judge Toulmin, who has comparatively little to do. Then there is the middle district, again in south Alabama, misnamed because it is in southeast and not middle Alabama, presided over by Judge Jones, who lives in Montgomery, in the southern part of the State. Then there is the northern district, with four courts, at Huntsville, Anniston, Tuscaloosa, and Birmingham, being composed of more than half the counties in the State, the great bulk of the business of the State being there; and Judge Jones presides over this district as well as the middle district. If the House has listened to the reading of Judge Jones's telegram it will have noted that he said he could not attend to the business of all these courts in two districts. He said so in his telegram to the Speaker; he says so in the statement that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WILEY] filed for him yesterday. Judge Jones says that he needs an additional judge, and he does not want anything done in this matter until he gets an additional judge. Well, I want an additional judge myself; I would be glad to have one. I asked for an additional judge, and the matter was referred to the Attorney-General of the United States, who replied that we had two judges in Alabama and that they were all we needed; that if the business was properly assigned to those two judges they could attend to it, and the Committee on the Judiciary thereupon refused to give us another judge to hold our courts in Alabama.

But they said to me, "If you can redistrict the State or reassign the judges we will do what we can to so rearrange your courts as to enable you to get your business disposed of." We tried to agree on a bill redistricting the State, but as the two judges live in south Alabama, and we did not want to make the lawyers come down a long parallelogram of 300 miles on each side of the State to get to south Alabama, we could not agree on a bill redistricting the State. Then the only other proposition we could make was to provide for the assignment of a judge to the court at Birmingham, where the congested condition of business is. Now, Judge Jones lives in the district of my colleague [Mr. WILEY]. He is there and attends to their business, and there is no congestion there. They can get their cases tried. Birmingham is a large railroad center, with many great corporations. There are many nonresident corporations, and whenever a suit is brought against one of those corporations, if it is a bad case the lawyers often take it to the United States court. The business of the court is congested. You can not get a trial in years, and it is a denial of justice to my people in that they can not get their cases tried. Now, what is this bill? What effect does this bill have? It does not do Judge Jones any harm. It does not make Judge Jones do one particle of work that he does not want to do. It merely provides at Birmingham, where there is more congested business than in any district in the United States, except the courts in the southern district of New York, that there shall be six months of court each year. We have about three months of court now, and this only provides for three months more of court. If Judge Jones can not hold the court—and I concede he can not hold court the additional three months—he shall certify the fact to the circuit judges, and they, under the general law as it exists to-day, shall assign some judge to come to Birmingham and hold court the other three months. Now, Judge Toulmin's time is not all taken up. He has time to spare. He can be assigned for this purpose, and that is what we expect. We can not divide the State. It is merely a proposition to make it mandatory that the circuit judges shall assign another judge to come to Birmingham and try the business before our courts. Now, that is all there is in the proposition.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama whether there is indisposition on the part of the Federal judges to do the work or an inability to do the work?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I admit Judge Jones can not do it. He says himself it would take him seventeen months to do the business in his district. He has got five courts and 65 per cent of the business of those five courts is in the court at Birmingham. But we are not trying to make Judge Jones do this business. We do not force him in the matter; we simply provide by this law—here is the language of the bill—

That whenever the judge for the northern district of Alabama deems it advisable, on account of disability or absence, or of the accumulation of business therein, or for any other cause, that said court should be held by the justice of some other district or circuit court, he shall, in writing, request the presiding justice for the fifth judicial circuit of the United States to assign a judge to hold the term or terms of said court.

Now, we are not making it mandatory on Judge Jones to hold this court. If Judge Jones wants to he can go there and hold the terms of court. I do not think he can. I do not think Judge Jones could attend to his business in the balance of the courts of these districts and go to Birmingham for six months, and this law does not contemplate that. We recognize he can not go there, but we want to have Judge Toulmin or some other judge assigned to go there and hold our court. Now, the stress of business is this: It is difficult to get a trial in that court, and you have got to send somebody else there to preside over these courts. If a suit is brought against one of the railroad companies in my district and they do not want to try it they can take it into the Federal court, and there it must lie indefinitely or the man who brings the suit must compromise it.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama what the line of argument was that the Department of Justice used in determining adversely against the establishment of a court when this condition exists?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I state that Judge Toulmin has a very small district, with comparatively little work to do. Judge Jones has two large districts and a great deal of work to do. Now, the Department recognized that Judge Jones needed relief, but they said two judges were enough for Alabama; instead of giving another judge, that we ought to have a reapportionment of this business so that the two judges in Alabama could do it; and the Judiciary Committee unanimously reported this bill, and so did the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. It is along the line as advised by the Attorney-General.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Why is it that the circuit judges can not be relied on to assign a judge?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, they go to other places. They are assigned to other courts. Judge Toulmin often goes to New Orleans and sits as circuit judge.

Mr. KEIFER. Presumedly the circuit judges do their duty in assigning the judges.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; but they are assigned somewhere else and go somewhere else, but here is where the pressure is; here is where relief is needed. And this is in line with the recommendation of the Attorney-General of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The time has expired. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the Chair was in doubt.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 45.

Mr. WILEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER (after counting). Fourteen gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused. The ayes have it, and the bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BEEF-TRUST CASES.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the opinion of Judge Humphrey in the case of the United States v. Armour & Co. and others, and the oral argument of the Attorney-General in that case, and the statutes upon which the opinion was rendered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, what is the decision the gentleman wants to insert in the RECORD?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I will state, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Mississippi that the purpose of making this request, or the reason for making this request is——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am informed that this is the Chicago Packers' case. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The opinion and other papers are as follows:

Oral argument of the Attorney-General in the district court of the United States for the northern district of Illinois. The United States v. Armour & Co. et al., before Judge Humphrey and a jury.

Mr. MOODY. May it please your honor, I may as well, perhaps, now, as at any time in the course of my argument, address myself to the question which my learned friend has this moment been discussing—the question whether under this immunity act immunity can be conferred upon a corporation as well as an individual.

I shall say little upon that question, because I care less. The Government of the United States, your honor, is too much in earnest in this prosecution to be diverted to the pursuit of a nerveless, senseless, soulless creation of the law. If wrong has been committed, we are seeking the punishment of the men who committed the wrong—the living, breathing human beings. The Government of the United States, and the people of the United States, will be satisfied with no less than that. (Hale v. Henkel, 200 U. S., —.)

In the Hale case, last Monday, the Supreme Court decided two questions: First, that a corporation, which could not testify, or, as a witness, produce papers, is not within the terms of the immunity act of 1903, which, in the words of the court, is in almost the exact language of the immunity act now before your honor for interpretation; and second, that a corporation engaged in interstate commerce is not entitled to withhold its books and papers from the scrutiny of the properly authorized officers of the Federal Government; and that the fifth amendment of the Constitution does not grant to such a corporation the right which an individual would have to withhold the same evidence upon the ground that it might tend to incriminate him. Those two propositions distinctly held by that court are conclusive of the contention which my friend has just now submitted to you.

I trust, your honor, that by no one will my presence here be misconstrued. I sincerely trust it may not be taken to show a belief on my part that those who have safeguarded the interests of the Government heretofore need reenforcement, far less a belief on my part that if reenforcement were needed I could bring it. I realize full well the learning, the skill, the ingenuity which the distinguished gentlemen who are representing these defendants have brought to the trial of this cause, but I think I say no more than is his due when I say that the representative of the United States, the district attorney, in his powerful and conclusive argument of last week has shown his capacity to meet them upon equal terms, and when I say that I say what is a compliment to any man. He has done his work well, and let him not forget that the people of this country who are looking to your honor and to this court room, as they have never looked to a court room before in the history of the Government, have realized the manner in which he has performed his duty, and if he has no other reward in this case, he has the reward of the approval of his own conscience and the commendation of all his countrymen.

I need not apologize, I think, to your honor for my appearance at the bar of this court, unusual and almost unprecedented as it is. The law gives me the right to appear, and after great deliberation I believed it to be my duty to appear. The justification for my appearance is found not only in the importance of this case alike to the defendants and to the Government, but in the effect which the sustaining of the defendants' contention would have upon much of the important litigation of the United States. If immunity be conferred upon these defendants upon the ground on which it is here claimed, it would overthrow the executive interpretation of the Cullom Act (act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, 24 Stat., 379; 1 Supp. R. S., 529), acquiesced in by all for nearly twenty years, and fatally cripple the Government in its attempt to enforce the laws of the land. I realize quite well that the executive department of this Government can not interpret the laws for the court; the judges of the courts are and ought to be independent of the executive officers of this Government. But it is no light thing to overthrow a contemporaneous and long-continued construction of an act by those whose duty it is to administer it, and courts, realizing the gravity of doing that, have always regarded with respect a long-continued and contemporaneous executive interpretation of an act. During the nearly twenty years in which the Cullom Act has been upon the statute book, that no immunity could be conferred upon anyone except upon him who gave sworn testimony or sworn evidence has not been doubted by any of the law officers of the Government, by any of the Attorneys-General—and there have been many names in that time with which I may well shrink from bringing my own into comparison—that has not been doubted by any member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and upon the roll of that body has been found the names of many distinguished lawyers—none more distinguished, none so distinguished, as the name of Judge Cooley, who was its first Chairman.

No member of the Interstate Commerce Commission has ever doubted for one moment, from the enactment of that law until this day, that immunity was conferred only upon the witness who under oath gave testimony or produced evidence. The Cullom Act itself, your honor, in a section to which I shall refer more at large later in my argument, created a long list of offenses punishable by fine and imprisonment—offenses which may be generally described as discriminations between persons or between localities. The Cullom Act also provided that it should be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to require, not upon oath, but to require information from common carriers that would be vitally material in every one of the prosecutions which might be undertaken under the act, and the common carriers, whether corporations or persons, have complied from the beginning with that requirement of the Commission. If the contention of our friends is true, Congress was guilty of the absurdity of enacting in one section of a law a provision creating and punishing crimes, and enacting in another section of the same law a provision requiring statements from those who would commit the crimes which would necessarily give them immunity. Congress never contemplated such absurdity as that.

Let me illustrate, if your honor please, for I speak under a deep sense of personal and official responsibility for these prosecutions all over the country—let me illustrate my meaning by a case now pending before the grand jury in the southern district of New York. Not long ago the enterprise of the proprietor of one of the New York papers discovered much information which tended to show that all the great trunk lines running out of New York City had been practicing discrimination in the form of rebates to the American Sugar Refining Company. With what I believe was rare self-denial and a high sense of public duty that evidence was offered to the Department of Justice. Out of it charges have grown against the railroads and against the sugar company, and they are now under consideration by the grand jury. I express no opinion whether the charges are true or false; there are ways of deciding that question when the time shall come. These rebates, amounting in the aggregate to hundreds of thousands of dollars, have been often given to the sugar company to aid it in its fight with the farmers who are conducting the struggling industry of producing sugar from beets. When the sugar company wanted to overcome the competition of the farmer, wanted to lay such stress upon him that he would give up the contest in despair and dispose of his property to the monopoly, it went to the railroads and borrowed a club by which it clubbed the farmer to death. And if my friend's contention is true, the men managing those railroads, who helped the sugar trust in its fight with the farmers, by reason of the fact that they made their returns in obedience to the requirements of the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing their tariffs, showing their lawful and published rates, are immune from prosecution.

Those are the considerations which have led me here to-day to implore your honor to weigh this question well; that following that epoch-making decision of the Supreme Court only a week ago, you will not mutilate and destroy the weapon which that decision has put into the hands of the people.

Somewhat more than a year ago the Supreme Court decided the case of Swift v. United States (196 U. S., 375), which, as your honor well remembers, was a petition under the Sherman Act against, in the main, the same individuals and these same corporations for an injunction against the continuance of what the Government claimed to be a combination under the Sherman Act. Once that case had been decided, there came pouring into the Government at Washington, to the Bureau of Corporations, and above all to the Department of Justice, complaints from all parts of the land that the injunction was not being observed and that the offense set forth in that bill continued. It seemed to me proper that those complaints should be laid before the representatives of the people, sitting in the grand inquest, for this district of the United States, and they were so submitted, and a long and a careful, and I hope and trust a fair, investigation was made by that body. In the meantime Mr. Garfield had begun and almost completed his investigations of the concerns of these defendants, these corporations. That investigation apparently was for a period ending on July 1, 1904. Although the investigation itself lasted longer than that date, the scrutiny of Mr. Garfield and his subordinates was directed, apparently, solely upon the period ending July 1, 1904.

In the meantime, this indictment on the 1st day of July, 1905, was returned into this court. It is not of primary importance; it is not conclusive of this case, but it has the same significance that the twenty years' absence of a claim of this kind has had in all the other cases prosecuted throughout the United States—that these defendants then made no suggestion of immunity. They had been advised at every stage of this proceeding by counsel as able as the land could afford; they knew the facts and were advised of their counseis' views of the law. When the suggestions against this prosecution, numerous and entirely legitimate, came to the Department of Justice from any quarter, the thought of immunity was absent from them. When your honor was requested by the defendants' counsel to instruct the grand jury at the beginning of their deliberations, not a word was said about immunity. When the grand jury returned the indictment, pleas to the organization of that body and to the jurisdiction of the court were filed and overruled; demurrers to the indictment later were disposed of in this court. The claim that the Government by earlier proceedings on the civil side of the court had conclusively elected to pursue the civil to the exclusion of the criminal remedy, was advanced, and apparently has been abandoned. It is said by my friends that this plea of immunity which was filed some four months after the indictment was returned into court was filed as early as it could be filed; that they wished, first, to exhaust their dilatory pleas before they interposed their plea in bar to this prosecution. I do not know but what that is the true rule of law, but when upon the very day of the indictment they moved to dismiss McRoberts, and secured his dismissal in this court, they then knew the place and the time where immunity should be claimed.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. That is not the fact. It was the first day of this trial.

Mr. MOODY. The first day of the present trial?

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. Then that argument, of course, disappears entirely. I understood it to be the other way. The fact is that these defendants appear to have a strange aversion to the hearing of any evidence upon the question of their guilt. Whenever Garfield, in his investigation, came near a tender spot—the National Packing Company, for instance—he was led away. Whenever he got "warm," as we used to say in childhood days, he was taken to another part of the room. And when we filed our petition under the Sherman Act the only answer they had to it was to admit by demurrer the facts stated in the petition, facts which after twenty days' deliberation the Supreme Court of the United States, without a dissenting voice, pronounced to be a violation of the law of the land. The defendants have pleaded that they are not guilty of this indictment. They do not say here that they are not guilty, but they say that, whether they are guilty or not, each of them, each of the twenty-two corporations and individuals, has received a pardon.

The Garfield investigation and report, which they joyfully welcomed with open arms, seized upon as persuasive evidence that the profit which they had made in the conduct of their business indicated that they were rather engaged in the business through philanthropic motives than for purposes of gain, and circulated as a fit rebuke to those who had charged them with any wrongdoing—that report, they say, the result of that investigation, was not only a tract for the conversion of the unregenerate people, but a fountain of saving grace in which every one of them who bathed might be washed free of his sins. If that be the law we must submit to it. It is claimed for each one of these defendants, separately, that the effect of that investigation was to give him a pardon, and upon each one, separately, rests the burden of proof. They can not claim their immunity comes to them as a class. They can not dump all this evidence before your honor and all the names of these defendants into the same basket and say that out of that mixture comes immunity for everyone. Sometimes as I have listened to the arguments of my friends on the other side it would seem as if they thought that if anyone had testified about anything relating to an offense committed by anybody that everybody was immune. Now, each one of these defendants must claim and show that under the act of 1893 immunity came to him separately, for the reason that he, in the Garfield investigation, was compelled to furnish evidence against himself, and that therefore he is entitled to the benefits of the immunity act, which supplants the Constitution, which otherwise would have protected him from the disclosure of such evidence.

Of course your honor will quite understand that my contention will be that there is that absence of legal process here which brings all these defendants upon the same plane, but, for the moment adopting without conceding the claim of my friends upon the other side, these cases, although they are tried together, raise separate issues, and upon the trial one of the defendants may be immune; another may not be immune. Each one must show that he was compelled by Mr. Garfield to give evidence against himself with regard to the offense charged against him in this indictment. The Hale case, your honor, shows clearly what the burden is upon each one of these defendants separately. It is not true, as one of my learned friends said this afternoon, that the Supreme Court decided that Hale was entitled to immunity. The Supreme Court decided that Hale could not refuse to answer, because, if his answers related to any offense charged against him he would have immunity from prosecution for that offense. Let me read a word or two from the opinion of the court. The court was then, at this point, considering the contention that this statute was not a sufficient safeguard to Hale, because there was no way in which he could distinctly prove the character of the testimony which he had been compelled to give, and therefore it would be difficult and impracticable for him to obtain the immunity which the act of 1903 afforded him. With regard to that the court said this:

"The suggestion that a person who has testified compulsorily before a grand jury may not be able, if subsequently indicted for some matter concerning which he testified, to procure the evidence necessary to maintain his plea is more fanciful than real"—not more fanciful than real, because it is not necessary for him to procure such evidence but for the reasons which the court goes on to state: "He would have not only his own oath in support of the immunity, but the notes often, though not always, taken of the testimony before the grand jury, as well as the testimony of the prosecuting officer and of every member of the jury present. It is scarcely possible that all of them would have forgotten the general nature of his incriminating testimony or that any serious conflict would arise therefrom."

I quote this, not for the purpose of dwelling on the word "incriminatory," as your honor will see later in my argument. I quote this for the purpose of showing that in each individual one of these cases it must be proved by that defendant that he himself gave some testimony or produced some evidence which related to some offense charged against him.

I may as well stop a moment right here and discuss that question, because it has been recently discussed. We have been so unfortunate—I will not say unfortunate—we have not been clear enough to make our position in that respect understood by the other side. I have no doubt whatever that the fault is ours. I understand that the privilege of the witness and the immunity of the witness is personal to himself. He is protected from producing any evidence or giving any testimony which might incriminate him. He can take advantage of the privilege of no other person, whether that privilege be of an individual or a corporation. It is not a question of whose property the incriminating evidence may be, if it is evidence consisting of books or papers or documents. For instance, I have in my possession the diary of my friend Morrison. I have stolen it from him, if you please; it does not belong to me at all. It contains entries which incriminate him. I am summoned before a grand jury to produce that. I am bound to give it up. I can not plead his privilege. A telegraph operator is brought before your honor as a witness. He has a copy of a telegram which I wrote and sent and it incriminates me. He can not decline to produce it before the grand jury on account of any privilege that I might have. Again, I have the diary of my friend Morrison. It contains in it an entry, verified, perhaps, by my initials, criminating me. All the powers of the Government can not take it from my possession, because it is my personal right under the Constitution not to be compelled to give evidence against myself.

Mr. MILLER. They could compel you to give it up if they didn't put you under oath, couldn't they?

Mr. MOODY. Compel me to give it up?

Mr. MILLER. Yes; if they didn't put you under oath.

Mr. MOODY. Of course they can't, because I wouldn't give it up. I don't require a constitution or an immunity statute if I have got it; I hold on to it until I am brought by process of law into court, and then I no longer rely upon myself. I rely upon the protection of the Constitution, and I have a right to rely upon the protection of the Constitution.

Mr. MILLER. Before you have been put under oath?

Mr. MOODY. No; when I become a witness. That is clear, and will appear by and by, and I didn't think that was disputed in this case. Now, apply that to some of the evidence in this case—or, rather, I withdraw the word "apply." I will not attempt to apply it to the evidence in this case, because I do not accurately know the evidence in this case. But I will illustrate by the evidence in this case for the purpose of making the rule apply as I understand it, and we will suppose for clearness of the illustration that the investigation is before a grand jury. If Mr. Armour, or Mr. Morris, or any one of these defendants were subpœnaed to appear before that grand jury and to produce those books, the answer they probably would make, the answer that they ought to make, is that they were not in their possession. But we will assume that they were in their possession; we will assume that the witness had in his custody and control all the books. He could not withhold those books, or if he produced them he could not obtain the immunity which supplants the right to withhold them unless the books which he brought in contained evidence which criminated him, or, to be more accurate, which contained evidence relating to some offense with which he might be charged. It is not important that the books tended to show that some one else was guilty or tended to show that the corporation had committed an offense. It is essential that the books should show that the witness had committed some offense, or, rather, to be accurate again, should contain evidence relating to an offense with which the witness might be charged, and if the witness under oath——

The COURT. To your last statement there is no dispute between you and counsel.

Mr. HYNES. No.

Mr. MOODY. No; there is no dispute; I shall make that clear later on. I will say in passing that I do not concede for one moment that the direction of the president or of a director of a corporation to the subordinate, accountant, or chief of accountants, the man who has the custody and control of the books, to allow them to be inspected by the Government officer who has the right to inspect them, is a production of evidence within the ordinary sense in which language can be used. Moreover, each one of these defendants, separately, must show to your honor that he has been compelled to testify or produce evidence relating to the offense charged in this indictment and in every count of this indictment. I do not know that there would be any distinction at all, either the one way or the other about that, between the counts; but every one of the counts of that indictment must be treated as if it were a separate indictment. Moreover, I understand it to be the truth, and your honor will of course correct me if it is not so, that this investigation, as appears by the report, was for a period ending on July 1, 1904, a year before the finding of this indictment. The investigation itself continued much longer than that period, but the period investigated, according to all reports of the evidence and according to the fair interpretation of this report, ended July 1, 1904. Now, this indictment, and every count of it, could be sustained by proof of a conspiracy formed later than that period. The allegation in the indictment, it is true, is that a conspiracy was formed upon the first day of the first boundary line of the statute of limitations, three years before.

The COURT. But, General Moody, hasn't the Government the right to prove any fact occurring during the period covered by the statute?

Mr. MOODY. I don't know; that question would arise later.

The COURT. I say, as the Government would have that right, if any such fact was furnished by the witness, by the parties pleading here, wouldn't that fact be of and concerning a matter covered by the indictment, if it were such a fact as the Government would have the right to prove on the trial? And of course the Government would have the right to prove any fact for any date three years prior to the time fixed in the indictment.

Mr. MOODY. It is possible your honor is right. My only suggestion was that this bar must be a complete bar to the indictment, and a complete bar to every one of the counts, but it is a matter that is so collateral I will not stop to insist upon it. I think it is very likely you may be right in that statement, and that I may be wrong in my illustration.

Mr. MILLER. The plea avers that this investigation that was made was concerning the matters alleged in the indictment. The replication does not take any issue with that fact, but only with the matter of the compulsory character, or the later averments of the plea. The evidence shows the investigation did not end until after the grand jury was in session.

Mr. MOODY. I quite agree that that is so, and have said so several times. I have spoken as I have concerning the evidence in the case, and expressed my views as to its applicability and as to the rules which should govern your honor in the determination of every question arising under it, solely for the purpose of saying that the difficulty and the complexity of the inquiry which must be made under such rules at once challenges attention to the question whether Congress ever intended that immunity could be obtained in this way and that it could depend upon the oral testimony and the fallible recollection of human witnesses.

I have not discussed the facts of this case, both because I have not the capacity to discuss them from lack of understanding them, and from the further fact that in each one of these separate cases, in which each one of these defendants claims his immunity, there is a common factor; there is a total absence of the subpœna, of the oath, or any vestige of the compulsory process of the law. I regard this absence, which is undisputed, as decisive of the case as a matter of law, and I shall submit the reasons for that belief.

When the common law, or any court sitting under the common law, is engaged in an inquiry as to the truth of a fact, it does not, as do the courts under the rules of other systems of law, proceed solely by the rules of free logic. We have the great exclusionary rules. If anyone of us as a private citizen should inquire whether a given fact were true or not, it would be of great importance to us that an honest man told us that another man whom we believed to be honest had said that the thing was true or false. The law, the English common law, the American common law, the law of this land, excludes us from the use of testimony of that kind. So, if outside the court room we wish to know whether any person has committed a given offense, whether one of our own children has been guilty of any crime, we should go and ask him; we should expect him to answer. But the law, for wise reasons, which it is not necessary for us to consider in this case, excludes that, shuts up that avenue to the truth, and we have the exclusionary rule, not expressed as a rule of law, but crystallized into the Constitution. It says: "Nor shall any person be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

I do not much believe in reading text-books or in reading cases in an oral argument, but in one or two instances I propose to depart from my usual practice. I propose to read from Wigmore. Any stranger coming in here and not knowing much about this case would think that the real persons on trial were Garfield and Wigmore, with Morrison under strong suspicion; but your honor has been a prosecuting officer, as we all have in our time, and you know that it is the universal testimony of all the counsel who defend people accused of crime that the only really guilty persons are those who are seeking to enforce the law.

Mr. HYNES. You don't include Garfield in that description?

Mr. MOODY. In what description?

Mr. HYNES. Those who are prosecuting.

Mr. MOODY. No; I don't. You did, but I don't. I know your honor is familiar with this treatise, but we should get into the spirit of the privilege before we attempt to construe it, and for my own sake I should like to reread this page. It is contained in one of the sections quoted with approval by the Supreme Court last week, cited in the McAllister case, as stating the history of the origin of the constitutional privilege and its limitations, and it is for the purpose of showing some of its limitations that I read this extract:

"In preserving the privilege, however," says this learned author, "we must resolve not to give it more than its due significance. We are to respect it rationally for its merits, not worship it blindly as a fetish. We are not merely to emphasize its benefits, but also to concede its shortcomings and guard against its abuses. Indirectly and ultimately it works for good—for the good of the innocent accused and of the community at large. But directly and concretely it works for ill—for the protection of the guilty and the consequent derangement of civic order. The current judicial habit is to ignore its latter aspect, and to laud it undiscriminatingly with false cant. A stranger from another legal sphere might imagine, in the perusal of our precedents, that the guilty criminal was the fond object of the court's doting tenderness, guiding him at every step in the path of unrectitude, and lifting up his feet lest he fall into pits digged for him by justice and by his own offenses.

"The judicial practice, now too common, of treating with warm and fostering respect every appeal to this privilege, and of amiably feigning each guilty invocator to be an unsullied victim hounded by the persecutions of a tyrant, is a mark of traditional sentimentality. It involves a confusion between the abstract privilege—which is indeed a bulwark of justice—and the individual entitled to it, who may be a monster of crime. There is no reason why judges should lend themselves to confirming the insidious impression that crime in itself is worthy of protection. The privilege can not be enforced without protecting crime; but that is a necessary evil, inseparable from it, and not a reason for its existence. We should regret the evil, not magnify it by approval. No honest and intelligent accused (in the language of the Commissioners above quoted) has anything to fear from a criminal prosecution fairly conducted. To every such person the appeal to the privilege is a repugnant and humiliating expedient. The spirit of every manly nature, unfortunate enough to be unjustly accused, must always be that of the brave and bluff Mr. George, who, when falsely charged with murder and urged by his friends to seek the services of a lawyer, stanchly refused:

"'Say I am innocent and I get a lawyer; what would he do, whether or not? Act as if I was guilty—shut my mouth up, tell me not to commit myself, keep circumstances back, chop the evidence small, quibble, and get me off perhaps. But, Miss Summerson, do I care for getting off in that way? * * * I don't intend to say,' looking round upon us, with his powerful arms akimbo and his dark eyebrows raised, 'that I am more partial to being hanged than another man. What I say is, I must come off clear and full, or not at all. Therefore, when I hear stated against me what is true, I say it's true; and when they tell me, "Whatever you say will be used," I tell them I don't mind that—I mean it to be used. If they can't make me innocent out of the whole truth, they are not likely to do it out of anything less or anything else.'"

That closes the quotation, and the author goes on to say:

"There ought to be an end of judicial cant toward crime. We have already too much of what a wit has called 'justice tampered with mercy.' A due respect for the privilege is perfectly consistent with a strict contempt for the guilty offender, and does not require or condone his protection as an end good in itself or good under any circumstances. It is enough for justice and for the Commonwealth that the privilege exists, immovably fixed in the Constitution. The good which it aims at consists in that general fact and system, and not in the individual application of it to a given claimant. That effects mostly harm—a particular harm which we suffer for the larger good.

"The privilege therefore should be kept within limits the strictest possible. So much of it lies in the interpretation that its scope will be greatly affected by the spirit in which that interpretation is approached."

Approaching, then, the interpretation of the constitutional privilege in that spirit, in the spirit of the language just read, and a week ago approved by the Supreme Court as stating the proper limitations of the privilege, approaching it without either attempting to exaggerate its benefits or diminish them, let us see what the privilege is. Surely we have abundant material from which we can ascertain with accuracy what the constitutional privilege of the witness was, because the common law, the Constitution of the United States, and the constitutions of all of the forty-five States of the Union are all the same. Expressed in slightly differing words, they all mean the same thing, and they all mean just what the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The privilege of the citizen is that he shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself, not that he shall not be induced or persuaded to be a witness against himself, not that he shall not even be deceived or defrauded into being a witness against himself, but that he shall not be "compelled" to be a witness against himself. This constitutional safeguard is not the privilege of the citizen until he becomes a witness. It is the privilege of the citizen when he becomes a witness, and when he becomes a witness, wherever he may be, whether in an open court, whether in the secrecy of the grand jury room, whether before a committee of the legislature or before any other official authorized to administer an oath, the privilege attaches to him there. To violate this privilege is to compel the person who appeals to it to be a witness against himself. "The interdiction of the fifth amendment," said the Supreme Court last Monday, "operates only where a witness is asked to incriminate himself—in other words, to give testimony which may possibly expose him to a criminal charge"—where a witness is asked to give testimony which may possibly expose him to a criminal charge. It operates only where a witness is asked to give testimony. Those words are measured. Garfield can not waive those words, although I should not be surprised that an extension of the same doctrine that an administrative officer could waive a statute of the United States might be later found to mean that some one could waive the language of the Supreme Court of the United States. This is expressed again in Wigmore, and it is the last time I shall refer to it; in just a word, on page 3123; just a sentence, and I will limit my quotation. This is speaking of the constitutional privilege, too:

"In other words, it is not merely compulsion that is the kernel of the privilege, in history and in the constitutional definitions, but testimonial compulsion. The one idea is as essential as the other."

Testimonial compulsion. The witness must be compelled; he must be compelled to testify. Again, the quotation I just laid before your honor:

"The interdiction of the fifth amendment operates only where a witness is asked to incriminate himself—in other words, to give testimony which may possibly expose him to a criminal charge." "The general principle, therefore," continues Wigmore, "in regard to the form of the protected disclosure, may be said to be this: The privilege protects a person from any disclosure sought by any legal process against him as a witness."

The Supreme Court and the distinguished author each measures the words with care. The idea contained in this language of the court, with which I have compared this language of the author, is the same—that the constitutional privilege is an exemption against compulsion upon the citizen when he becomes a witness. Only then, and at no other time; only there and nowhere else. Accordingly, in the development of that principle the courts have held, with substantial uniformity, that the privilege is the privilege of the witness himself and that it can not be claimed by anyone except himself, neither by the party in whose cause he is testifying or by the counsel for the witness himself; and the courts have further held that in order to avail himself of this privilege he must assert it at the time when the incriminating question is put to him. The Bell case, in which it was held that in that case the claim of exemption need not be made, did not turn upon the constitutional amendment. It was the case of an ignorant negro, born under the shadow of the lash, with his whole mental habit under the domination of the white man in authority, and it was held—excluding it as evidence of an admission; it was held, rather, to withdraw that—that upon an attempt to indict him for falsity in an affidavit thus procured, that affidavit was not admissible in evidence. It may be an extreme case. I don't care whether it is or whether it is not, because the constitutional privilege of a witness must be distinguished from the right of an accused to the exclusion of his own confession which has been obtained from him by improper means.

We do not advance unless we think clearly, unless we put the principles of the law side by side, each apart from the other, and not try to mingle them together. Confessions have been always excluded where they have been obtained through the influence of the hope of favor or the fear of harm, where some one in a position of authority over the accused has held out to him the hope of favor if he would confess or has held over him the fear of harm if he would not confess. The law has said with regard to all such cases, not seeking to measure the amount of the influence, that if the influence in any degree was operative upon the mind of the accused when he made the confession, it was unsafe to admit testimony of the confession against the person upon his trial. Now, I wish to say a word about the Bram case. (Bram v. United States, 168 U. S., 532.) I should not be in fashion if I did not say something about the Bram case. In that case the Supreme Court held that the trial court had erroneously admitted a confession obtained from a prisoner while he was under arrest.

There are some superficial differences between the condition of Bram and the condition of Mr. Armour at the Chicago Club. Bram was the navigating officer of the ship in which the murder had been committed. He was the only man aboard the ship who could navigate it. They allowed him to navigate the ship until they got within sight of the harbor of Halifax; then after consultation the crew mustered together, rushed upon him, seized and overpowered him, and put him in irons. He was taken to the presence of the chief of police of Halifax, or the chief of detectives of Halifax, I don't know which. He was stripped of his clothing, and then he was interrogated, told that he was guilty, and, what the court held to be an inducement held out to him, that it would be a benefit to him if he would make a confession. Then he made what the Government regarded as a sufficient confession to urge it in evidence in the court below, and what the Supreme Court regarded as a sufficient confession to be brought within the rules of confession, and the evidence of it was excluded. It has been criticised as an extreme application of the rule. It is not important whether it is extreme or not to me here. The importance of that case here is in the language of the distinguished judge who wrote the opinion of the court, who said upon one page that the confession rule was "controlled" by the fifth amendment, although he went on to exclude the confession under a rule of law in distinction from that of the Constitution, which he cited, and sustained by the citation of cases. He said, further along, that the fifth amendment was a crystallization of the doctrine of confession. It is upon those two observations of that distinguished judge that our friends build up the greater part of their case.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. There is no dissent upon that proposition.

Mr. MOODY. No dissent on that proposition at all?

Mr. MILLER. It has been referred to approvingly in the same court.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Although there was a dissent in the case by Mr. Justice Brewer, it was not upon that proposition.

Mr. MOODY. The proposition was not involved in the decision; it was an expression of opinion. I think that learned judge would be surprised at the use that is being made of his language in this case and would regret that he ever used language in that way if he thought it could be put to the use to which my friends on the other side have sought to put it to-day. That the fifth amendment is the crystallization of the doctrine of confession in the sense that it grows out of the same purpose I do not deny; but that confessions are excluded by virtue of any right conferred upon the citizen by the fifth amendment I do deny; and I say that there is nothing in the words, I would almost say inadvertently used, in the words of Mr. Justice White which justified the belief that he thought that the right to have a confession improperly obtained excluded did grow out of the fifth amendment, although it was influenced by the fifth amendment. If that case has been followed upon that point or upon that passing suggestion, upon that use of words, hardly rising to the dignity of a dictum, I have not heard a case cited in which the approval has been expressed. I do go back again to the Hale case, because I believe the words of the court in that case were measured with reference to the criticism that has been made upon the Bram case. "The interdiction of the fifth amendment operates only where a witness is asked to incriminate himself—in other words, to give testimony which may possibly expose him to a criminal charge." It operates only upon a witness when he is compelled to give testimony as a witness. I cite the decision of the Supreme Court, not yet ten days old, against a dictum of one of its most distinguished judges, and leave that question here.

Mr. HUGHES. Is that sentence read from the opinion or is it interpolated by you?

Mr. MOODY. It is read from the words of the opinion. If Mr. Garfield, of course, by any promise of an immunity that he could not give, by the holding out of hope of immunity, or by exercising the influence of fear upon any one of these defendants, influenced them to make any statements to him, the same rule of law protects every one of these defendants as protected Bram, and when the time of their trial comes, evidence obtained in any such way can not be admitted against them.

Having in view, then, the exact extent of the constitutional privilege, with its exemption from compulsory testimony, let us consider the nature of the substitute by which it is possible to supplant the privilege itself.

Whereupon an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock Tuesday, March 20, 1906.

MARCH 20, 1906—10 a. m.

Court met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. MOODY. Your honor, at the adjournment of court yesterday afternoon I had concluded my discussion of the nature and limitations of the privilege conferred by the fifth amendment to the Constitution. I had thought it unnecessary to bring again to your honor's attention the various authorities that were relevant to that discussion, because I conceived that the nature and limitations of that constitutional privilege were clear, even if they were not entirely agreed upon between the opposing counsel in this case. I had concluded that the privilege secured by the fifth amendment to the Constitution is that a person can not be compelled, as a witness, before any tribunal to give incriminating testimony or evidence against himself over his claim of exemption. Let me for a moment analyze that statement. A person can not be compelled as a witness before any tribunal. In order to be entitled to the privilege he must be a witness before some tribunal under the compulsion of the law to give incriminating testimony or evidence against himself. The nature of the question from which he is excused from answering is a question which elicits testimony not only which relates to an offense, but incriminates the person giving the testimony. The compulsion must be exercised over his claim of exemption. I believe that my statement of the law in this regard is an accurate one. Having, then, clearly in view the nature and the exact limitations of the constitutional privilege, let us consider what would be necessary in order to supplant it.

The substitute by which the constitutional privilege may be supplanted must be coextensive with the privilege itself. It need not be more. It must be coextensive with the privilege. It need not be more. If, then, immunity from prosecution on account of the crime concerning which incriminating testimony may be given is enough, as it is adjudicated to be enough, then that immunity need only be given where the witness is compelled to give incriminating testimony against himself over his claim of exemption, under his oath, upon the stand, as a witness, by the compulsory process of the law. If the substitute does that, it is coextensive with the privilege and therefore is sufficient. We all ought to agree, I think, up to that point.

But the immunity, though it can not be narrower than the constitutional privilege, may be broader. The lawmaking body, so only that it furnishes an immunity coextensive with the privilege which is taken away, may give an immunity as much broader than that privilege as it chooses to give. It might give, as my friends here contend that it has given, immunity to everyone who, in any way, should furnish information concerning the offense which may be charged against the person giving the information.

I say it may be broader than the constitutional privilege. Whether it is, in point of fact, in any jurisdiction broader than the constitutional privilege must depend not upon our individual ideas of what would be desirable or equitable, but upon a scrutiny of the terms of the law by which the immunity is conferred.

Tested by that consideration, tested by a fair interpretation of the act creating immunity, it is my belief that the immunity given under that act is broader than the constitutional privilege which it supplants, and broader in two respects, and in two respects only.

The constitutional privilege conferred upon the witness the right to withhold only testimony which tended to criminate himself.

I believe that under this statute the immunity is given where the testimony "relates" to the offense for which immunity is sought, and I think that conclusion fairly follows from the wording of the act itself, because the immunity is given on account of any offense "concerning" which the witness may testify. Congress might in that respect—and still have given the full constitutional privilege and have provided a sufficient substitute for it—it might have said that the immunity should be given for any offense concerning which the witness gave testimony incriminating himself. But the absence of that limitation upon the testimony, that characterization of the testimony, leads my mind irrestibly to the conclusion that in that respect the immunity conferred by this law is broader than the constitutional privilege.

Now, in considering whether testimony is testimony "concerning" the offense, I agree that the same broad rule of relevancy should be adopted which was adopted at the common law or under the constitutional privilege in determining whether incriminating testimony was relevant to the offense. But, if your honor please, there must be some limit to relevancy established. However broad the field of relevancy may be, we must all concede that there must be a limitation to it. That limitation, though not easy to apply to the facts of any given case, is, I believe, easy of statement. It must be testimony which in some way is relevant to the guilty transaction in this case, the alleged conspiracy, the alleged unlawful agreement between the defendants, and anything which is not relevant to that in the broad manner in which I have stated—to that alleged guilty agreement—is not testimony "concerning" the offense.

I think, further, that the statutory immunity is broader than the constitutional privilege in another respect. It is well settled that the privilege arises only in the case that the person entitled to it makes his claim of the privilege upon his oath as a witness upon the stand. The statute might have insisted upon that condition as the condition of immunity, and if it had insisted upon that condition as a condition of immunity it would have still been broad enough to have in that respect, at least, supplanted the constitutional privilege. But here again the statute did not impose any such condition. It was silent. And from the absence of that provision in the act of immunity I conclude, with all due deference to those who may differ from me, that there is no need of a claim of immunity by the witness in order to set it up in bar of any prosecution against him. And in addition, I am somewhat influenced by the authority of the dictum in the Quarles case (13 Ark., 307), and of the decision in the Sharp case (People v. Sharp, 107 N. Y., 427), and of what I conceive to be the whole tendency of the opinion in the Hale case. Let me dwell upon those three authorities, or at least upon two of those authorities, for a moment.

The Quarles case, which is an Arkansas case, was this: The defendants were indicted for betting at a game of poker.

The witness was called and was asked if he had seen defendants betting at that time and he declined to answer on account of his privilege, and the constitutional privilege in Arkansas is, I may say in passing, although in different words, in substance the privilege in the Constitution of the United States. The immunity statute in the case was that the testimony which he should give in no instance could be used against him in any prosecution for the same offense. The court ruled that the witness could not be compelled to answer. Now it is very obvious that the ruling of the trial court was in accordance with the law, as finally settled in the Counselman case. From that ruling of the trial court an appeal was taken to the supreme court of that State and that ruling was reversed—the defendants in the meantime having been acquitted and the Government apparently having the right to appeal.

In the course of the discussion of the case, the court said that under this statute, which gave immunity by providing that the testimony should not be used against the witness who had given it upon the stand, it was not necessary for the witness to claim his privilege.

The Sharp case was a decision in accordance with the dictum in the Quarles case. The Sharp case was, as your honor of course recalls, the case of a person who was called as a witness before a legislative body in the State of New York to testify upon the subject of bribery, in which he was concerned. He gave testimony which tended to criminate him. He subsequently was indicted for the bribery concerning which he had testified, and the testimony which he gave before this committee was, over his objection, admitted upon the trial. The statute concerned in that case was substantially like the statute in Arkansas and substantially like the statute condemned in the Counselman case. There was another immunity statute, but it had no relevancy to the decision in this particular case.

The court held that the witness was entitled to the right not to have the testimony which he had given under those conditions used against him on trial, although he had not asserted his claim of privilege at the time he gave it.

In the Sharp case the witness had been subpœnaed; he had been subpœnaed before a tribunal which was a court with all the powers of a court—a tribunal which had a right to hear testimony and had a right to punish for contempt any witness before it.

Mr. MILLER. No.

Mr. MOODY. Yes; and it was so held in the jurisdiction of New York, in a case cited, in the very opinion, in the Sharp case.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Without reporting back to the Senate?

Mr. MOODY. I did not mean to go so far as that. I mean that the tribunal itself—of which a committee was, in the expression so frequently used in legislative bodies, of which the committee was the eyes and ears—had the power of punishing for contempt. A committee has no legal existence in and of itself. It is—and no better expression can be found than the frequent expression used in legislative bodies—it is the eyes by which the legislative body sees and the ears by which the legislative body hears. And this witness was then before a tribunal, in the sense in which I use the term, which had the power to punish for contempt.

Mr. HYNES. The committee had power to punish?

Mr. MOODY. No. I am not going over that explanation again. My idea, I think, is sufficiently clear.

Mr. HYNES. Power to report, as Garfield had?

Mr. MOODY. Yes; I understand that. In giving the opinion the court points out one or two surrounding circumstances which are of great importance:

"It was conceded," says Mr. Justice Danforth, "that at the time he testified the defendant was before that committee under the operation and compulsion of a subpœna duly issued by the committee, and that the testimony he gave was in response to questions propounded in their behalf."

Again: "It appears by the concession there made and already quoted, that upon objection being made to the introduction of Sharp's testimony, on the ground that his statements before the committee were privileged, made under compulsion of a subpœna and the constraint of an oath duly administered by the committee."

So that we have here a case where the witness was acting under compulsory legal process.

Moreover, although these cases may be distinguished on account of the nature of the immunity provided under the two laws then under consideration, from the nature of the immunity furnished by the act at the bar of this court, still in my judgment the distinction is without legal consequences.

I think the whole tendency of the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Hale case is, that if the witness had actually testified under the constraint of a subpœna and of an oath and actually given testimony which concerned the offense with which he might be charged, that testimony given under those circumstances, without any claim of immunity on his part, would have given him immunity against any prosecution on account of that offense.

Now, therefore, I have stated it to be my opinion that the immunity under the act before your honor is broader than the common-law privilege in the two respects that I have named: First, that the testimony need not be incriminating; it need only be relevant to the offense for which it is set up as a bar. Second, that in order to obtain immunity, if the provisions of the act are otherwise complied with, it is not essential that the witness should assert his privilege.

But it is my contention that in every other respect the privilege and the immunity are coextensive. The conditions of the privilege are made the conditions of the immunity. Subpœna, testify, evidence, produce, perjury, all show it. The use of those words all show it. That the claimant, to have immunity, must be a witness testifying or producing evidence under oath breathes from every pore of this act.

On the other hand, our friends claim that immunity comes under this act from any information, using the word in its broader sense, which may be furnished by the person claiming the immunity to the person officially making the investigation, and that claim is based upon the proposition that immunity is given in such case because the information is furnished under the compulsion of the law. There is no longer any pretense that there was any compulsion in fact exercised by Mr. Garfield, apart from the powers which the law had vested in him. If it were dealt with as a question of actual compulsion by what happened between the parties as they met, it would not come within gunshot of the most extreme case under which confessions have been excluded, and they are excluded where the influence of hope or of fear is of the slightest character. And so the claim is made that the information furnished to a Government officer entitled to have it is information furnished under compulsion of the law, and that by the act of 1893 such information confers immunity upon the person giving it. There is the issue between the parties, stated, I believe, accurately, if your honor please, and stated briefly.

This question is singularly free from authority. I intend to be within bounds when I say that our friends upon the other side have not only furnished no authority in the shape of a decision by any court to sustain their contention, but they have not furnished a single line or word of dictum from any judge or any text writer in existence. I think I am absolutely accurate in making that statement.

On the other hand, we have authority, not of course conclusive, not authority in the sense in which a decision of a court is authority. We have the authority of the executive interpretation of this act, contemporaneous and long continued and acquiesced in up to this time by all interested in its proper interpretation. Moreover, we have one adjudicated case, which I submit to your honor is in principle precisely in point. That is the case of Warner against The State (Warner v. State, 81 Tenn., 13 Lea, 52), already before your honor, in the 13th Lea, Tennessee. In that case a person was brought before a grand jury by the subpœna of the attorney-general of the State of Tennessee—or rather, in Tennessee all the county attorneys are called attorneys-general—by the attorney-general for the county of which the grand jury was representative. The attorney-general had no right to issue a subpœna, that right being vested in the grand jury alone. The witness was not sworn, and in that condition declined to answer questions propounded to him by the grand jury, and asserted his right under the Constitution thus to decline. Thus we have the case of a witness under a void subpœna—a person under a void subpœna who had not become a witness by the administration of an oath to him. Under those circumstances the judge of the court in which the grand jury was sitting held the witness for contempt, saying to him in substance that the immunity statute of Tennessee, which provides that "no witness shall be indicted for any offense in relation to which he has testified before the grand jury," took away his right of silence. The witness continued contumacious, and the punishment for contempt was imposed upon him by the trial judge, and he appealed to the supreme court of the State, and that court held that he could not be punished for contempt because the subpœna was absent and its place could not be supplied by a void subpœna; and especially because the oath had not been administered to him, and not testifying under oath he did not become a witness so that he would be entitled to the immunity provided by the law of Tennessee.

Just a few words from the opinion of the court:

"If, as Judge McKinney says, and as all must agree, the term 'witness' must be understood in a legal sense, and can only be applied to one brought before a grand jury by compulsion, a fatal objection to this proceeding is that the witness was not sworn to testify. It is for the failure to testify that he may be committed for contempt, if at all; and he could not testify at all until sworn—until sworn to speak the truth, etc., he was not a witness in any sense subjecting him to punishment for contempt for refusing to answer questions, as one of the essential elements of compulsion. The oath, and the only one the law regards as binding the conscience of a witness, was absent. If Warner had spoken in reply to the questions, ever so falsely, he would not have been guilty of perjury or other offense punishable by law. It necessarily follows that if Warner had answered questions criminating himself and others, he would have done so voluntarily and not as one under compulsion to attend and testify; and if indicted for the offense, as to which he had furnished evidence against others, he could not have successfully pleaded a statutory pardon in bar of the prosecution against him."

Let us pause a moment. The statute of Tennessee is singularly, in all essentials, like the immunity act now before your honor. It is not a statute providing that the testimony of the witness shall not be used. It is a statute providing, as the act of 1893 provides, that if the witness testifies he shall have immunity from prosecution. In every essential respect the two acts are alike. No witness shall be indicted for any offense in relation to which he has testified, says the Tennessee law. No person, the act of 1893 in substance says, shall be prosecuted for any offense concerning which—in relation to which, adopting the same words—in relation to which he has testified. Now, here is a precise decision of the highest tribunal of the State of Tennessee interpreting that statute as requiring the witness to testify under oath before he can obtain the immunity conferred upon him by the law. There, then, are all the authorities upon the precise and vital proposition which is in dispute between the parties. Upon the one side nothing; upon the other side a practice of twenty years and the decision of one of the highest tribunals of the courts of the States.

Mr. MILLER. Would I be interrupting the Attorney-General if I should ask how that executive practice is shown which is appealed to here?

Mr. MOODY. It is stated as other law is stated to the court.

Mr. MILLER. I mean——

Mr. MOODY. It will appear a little more clearly by and by, I think, when I come to a discussion of some of the statutes in the bill.

Mr. MILLER. I mean the executive construction.

Mr. MOODY. Yes; I know what you mean.

Mr. MILLER. The executive construction which prevails is what I mean.

Mr. MOODY. I understand what you mean.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. This leads me up to a consideration of the legislation itself. I have said that the immunity given by the law depends not upon our idea of what would be desirable and equitable as an immunity, but depends upon the interpretation of the statute law under which the immunity is claimed. Before I discuss the law in detail, I deem it wise and desirable to state my claim with precision to your honor. It is this:

Exactly as by the Constitution a citizen is protected from self-incrimination as a witness under the compulsion of legal process, so under the laws of immunity a citizen is given immunity only when as a witness under the compulsion of legal process he gives testimony or produces written evidence relating to an offense. The law gives immunity that is coextensive, with the exceptions named, with the constitutional privilege; just that and nothing more. And no officer of the Government, from the President down, no jury and no judge of any court, has a right to award immunity in any other case. This, with all the power that I have, I shall maintain before your honor.

I agree with Mr. Rosenthal that it conduces to clearness and accuracy of conclusions first to discuss the immunity as it grows out of the Cullom Act and the amendment or supplement to it contained in the act of 1893, and then proceed later to discuss how, if at all, the conclusions derived from those two acts are affected by the creation of the Bureau of Corporations and the description of its powers which are contained in section 6 of the act creating it.

Section 12 of the Cullom Act may be stated in the first place very generally. It gave to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to inquire and to obtain information in the broadest sense. The only limit upon that information was that it should be material to the performance of the duties of the Commission. Later the same section gave the power to the Commissioners to require by subpœna, testimony, and documentary evidence. In that connection it provided for the substitution for the constitutional privilege of the statutory immunity, and that statutory immunity was that the testimony or evidence given by the witness should not be used against him in any subsequent prosecution.

Then came the Counselman case (Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S., 547), in which a like provision contained in section 860 of the Revised Statutes was declared to be insufficient as a substitute for the constitutional privilege. It was declared to be insufficient upon grounds that may be as clearly indicated by an illustration as by anything else. You best illustrate from the simpler case generally. Suppose there were a general statute of immunity, as I have no doubt as time goes on there will be, and a witness was called before a grand jury and asked if he had taken part in a burglary. He said: "Yes; I took part in the breaking into that house in the nighttime. I had two confederates with me—Jones and Brown. We took the plunder away and the next morning I disposed of a part of it at a pawnbroker's on such a street, and I carried the rest of it out into the country and buried it. When I was there a little girl on her way to school spoke to me and I talked with her." Obviously it would be no protection to that witness to say that that testimony should not be used against him upon a prosecution for the offense of burglary, because through that testimony it would be very simple to trace the three housebreakers, in company together, just prior to the breaking; it would be very simple to identify the defendant by the testimony of the pawnbroker; it would be very simple to identify him by the testimony of the little girl on her way to school, and therefore the court has wisely decided that the immunity which simply made the testimony useless did not protect the citizen to the extent that the privilege of silence given by the fifth amendment to the Constitution protected him.

So the act of 1893 was passed—I don't care whether you call it an amendment or a supplement. In a broad way it was intended to take the place of that part of the Cullom Act which had been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. That act, instead of providing that the testimony should be useless against a person giving it, provided that if the person gave testimony under the conditions named he should be absolutely immune from any prosecution on account of the offense concerning which he had testified. That statute came before the Supreme Court in the case of Brown v. Walker (161 U. S., 591), and was sustained by a majority of the court and is now the law of the land. It follows therefore that if immunity is given in strict accordance with the law an equivalent to the privilege is afforded.

Coming now to a closer analysis of those two laws taken together, I venture to submit to your honor that this is not a case for the application of a strict rule of interpretation or the application of a liberal rule of interpretation. It is simply a case where the act should be interpreted according to its plain meaning. Seeking, then, to interpret the act in that way, I now return to section 12. I confess my indebtedness to my Brother Rosenthal for his most admirable analyses of this act—of these acts. Of course I do not agree with the conclusion, but I agree in the main with the analyses that he proposed to your honor. In the first place, under section 12, the Commission is given authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers and the right to obtain from such common carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the Commission to perform the duties and carry out the object for which it was created. That is the power to inquire and to obtain information in its broadest sense. No limit to the word "information." No limit is put upon the information by the act.

The COURT. And no specific mode of procedure?

Mr. MOODY. And no specific mode of procedure. It is open to the Commission to obtain that information in any manner which it chooses to use. There are, however, two specific ways in which knowledge can come to the Commission by following out the pathway laid out by the statute, and those I shall now refer to.

The first of those ways is to acquire knowledge through this power which is given to the Commission. "The Commission shall have the power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of * * * documents."

The COURT. Is it your idea that the law contemplates that the Commission shall begin by subpœnaing?

Mr. MOODY. I think it is entirely in the hands of the Commission.

The COURT. Very well.

Mr. MOODY. I think it is entirely in the hands of the Commission as to whether they shall begin by subpœna or not.

The COURT. Very well.

Mr. MOODY. This power to acquire knowledge is a power "to require by subpœna" the testimony and the evidence of witnesses.

It is further provided that in case of contumacy, which of course can refer only to the conduct of a person who is a witness or of refusal to obey a subpœna, the aid of a court may be invoked. And it is further provided, as a part of the same provision which authorized the Commission to obtain information through the requirement of a subpœna for the attendance, testimony, and evidence, a substitute for the constitutional exemption of the witness from incriminating himself. The law takes away the excuse that the testimony might incriminate the witness, and furnishes him the immunity provided, first in the act itself and later in the act of 1893. And I beg to call your honor's attention to the fact that that immunity is given in connection—and that is all that I say here now—that the immunity is given in connection with the testimony and the evidence that follows, which comes to the Commission from its power to require by a subpœna testimony and evidence, and that this deprivation of the constitutional privilege and substitution of the statutory immunity is not in any way connected with any other part of the act. And the claim is taken away—the claim of privilege is taken away and the immunity is conferred in its place, not for "information" which the witness may have furnished, but for "testimony" or "evidence" which he may have furnished.

Mr. MILLER. Might I ask the Attorney-General whether he means by evidence anything more than the production of the books, tariffs, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents referred to in the act?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Something——

Mr. MOODY. I do, yes; and I shall make that plain.

Mr. MILLER. Not the concrete thing?

Mr. MOODY. I simply desire to say here—perhaps it is not necessary—that when I use the word "evidence" I give to it the same meaning that I give to the word "testimony"—that it is the evidence and the testimony of a sworn witness——

The COURT. Well, now, going to the liability of the defendant to answer, is there any duty upon him to answer before he is subpœnaed?

Mr. MOODY. None whatever until there comes a duty, which I shall allude to, imposed upon him by the twentieth section, which has not yet been brought before your honor, but there is no duty——

The COURT. What do you make of the words "legal requirements?"

Mr. MOODY. I am going to argue that very fully to your honor, if you will permit me.

The COURT. Very well; take your own course.

Mr. MOODY. And I think, if your honor please, I venture to predict that I shall leave no doubt in your honor's mind, or in the mind of any fair-minded person, as to what Congress meant when it used the words "lawful requirements." I think I can predict that with safety.

Now, to show a little more clearly that the evidence which is referred to at the very threshhold of the provision for immunity means not merely books and papers and documents, but books and papers and documents that have been produced by a witness, verified by a witness, who seeks by that means to obtain his immunity under the law, I ask your honor's attention to a provision contained a little later in this section of the act referring to testimony taken by deposition. There is a provision in the next clause to that of immunity by which it is prescribed that the testimony of any witness may be taken by deposition. There follows that provision a prescription of the methods which must be taken by the Commission in order to obtain the deposition of the witness, and it concludes with this significant language: "Any person may be compelled to appear and depose, and to produce documentary evidence, in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify and produce documentary evidence before the Commission." The use of the word "witnesses" illustrates what the author of this act had in mind upon the preceding page when he said that the Commission shall have power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books and papers and agreements and documents. It is a declaration by the author of the act that he meant the production of books, papers, and documents by a witness.

Let me, for the purpose of making my argument clear, undertake to make Congress a person for the moment. I say to Congress: "When you said that the Commission should have the power of requiring by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documents and papers, did you mean that language to be understood as saying that these documents should be produced as evidence by a witness?" "Yes," says Congress. "Well," I reply, "so it seems to me. But my brother Miller, one of the most distinguished lawyers of the West, says you did not mean that; says you meant by the production of all books, papers, tariffs, and contracts only that they should be brought into court. Now, I have got to meet it. How shall I answer?" Congress says: "Well, I meant to use that language in the sense of evidence given by a witness, and I think it ought so to be construed in and of and by itself." "But," reflecting a moment, Congress says to me: "I not only meant it, but I said that I meant it upon the very next page of this law, because when I undertook to describe the effect of that language I said, in speaking of the production of evidence by a deposition, that it might be compelled 'in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify and produce documentary evidence before the Commission, as hereinbefore provided." "That," says Congress, "is a distinct affirmation, not only in the same law, but in the same section and upon the next page, that when I spoke about the production of books and papers and tariffs and contracts I meant the production of these papers and documents by a witness." And it closes debate upon that proposition.

So I say that the first proposition which I make to your honor is this, that as you enter upon the threshold of the door that opens into immunity you find the provision that the Commission shall have power to require, by subpœna, the testimony and evidence given or produced by a witness.

Mr. MILLER. Now, might I ask whether if a person subpœnaed to produce his books comes in with his books under his arm and passes them over to the tribunal, is any evidence necessary, any testimony by him or anybody else necessary, as against him, that those are his books; and when they are produced, the record showing that the defendant or persons charged produced them as his books, don't they become the very evidence that that or any other law provides for as against that person, without his oath? Don't they become evidence within the law?

Mr. MOODY. No; it is because you are keeping your mind off the real question in this case—purposely and intentionally. My friends have argued all around this case. Our claim is that the statute has provided an immunity coextensive, and more than coextensive, with the constitutional privilege and exactly coextensive in the respect that the immunity grows out of the testimony, the evidence spoken or produced under the oath provided for by the law. And it is not of any importance whether or not between parties who are not concerned at all primarily with pardon, it is necessary to verify evidence and verify documents that are produced and offered in open court.

The COURT. Now, without seeking to disturb the course of your argument, and you may answer now or later as may be more convenient to your programme, if you concede that the Commission in carrying out the provisions of this act may begin with a private inquiry not based upon any subpœna, is there any duty upon the citizen to answer the inquiry until the subpœna comes?

Mr. MOODY. None whatever.

The COURT. Then what goes of the concession you have already made, that there is no duty upon the citizen to claim his immunity under the act?

Mr. MOODY. I confess I do not——

The COURT. I believe you stated that.

Mr. MOODY. Yes; I have stated——

The COURT. The immunity flows from the law, that in order to get it you must demand a subpœna, and is not the effect of that to claim immunity?

Mr. MOODY. Oh, yes; yes. I am very much gratified that your honor suggested that thought to me, because I think it suggests why we all have been a little troubled about the necessity of the claim on the part of the person who is seeking immunity, that he shall have his immunity. Proceeding upon the defendants' view, that immunity can be conferred by the giving of information, in the broadest terms, of course a proper condition to conferring immunity upon such considerations would be that the person who seeks it should claim it, and in some way indicate to the governmental officer that he refused, or desired not to be interrogated upon this subject; so that he might, by that refusal, indicate to the governmental officer that he was unwilling to proceed, and that he must be compelled to proceed in order to have a substitute for the compulsion of legal process. So that I agree that if you are going into an immunity as broad as our friends upon the other side claim, then, as your honor has suggested, it might well be that the person claiming the immunity should make the claim of his privilege, the claim of his right under the law, so that there might be something to indicate that there was compulsion exerted, that there was an unwillingness to be overcome.

Mr. HYNES. Has he any privilege to claim?

Mr. MOODY. I think he has not, because I absolutely and utterly repudiate the theory upon which these defendants are trying this case and upon which they claim immunity. I say that they obtain immunity only in the case that is described and carefully limited by the law itself.

The COURT. Do you think Congress contemplated giving the officers power to make an inquiry which the citizen was not liable to answer?

Mr. MOODY. Oh, yes. I think there is no doubt about that. Suppose the jurisdiction were either in the Interstate Commission or in the Bureau of Corporations, as in the case of private cars, information there could be obtained from any source——

The COURT. I do not speak of the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. MOODY. We might take Mr. Armour's most interesting and able articles upon private cars.

The COURT. Take the question where the jurisdiction is not questioned.

Mr. MOODY. Suppose the jurisdiction in a field unquestioned, for instance, in the Bureau of Corporations a question of overcapitalization; of course the Commissioner can go to Massachusetts, and there under the corporation law in force obtain all the statistics with regard to the capitalization of corporations formed under the law of Massachusetts. He may, if he chooses, take the works of a standard writer. He may talk with an economist. He may talk with a man who is familiar with any one great corporation, and get his advice and his information. What Congress has done in the first part of the act is to impose the duty upon the Commission of obtaining in any way, by the broadest inquiry, any sort of information which would be useful to it in the performance of its duty. Then Congress proceeded further, and recognizing that the time might come when it would be desirable for the Commission to call witnesses, Congress conferred upon it the power of requiring by subpœna the attendance of witnesses and the production of books. In that connection, and in that connection alone, was there a necessity for giving immunity, and I submit that in that connection, and in that connection alone, was immunity in point of fact given by the law enacted by Congress.

There is still another matter in which the Commission can get knowledge under the provisions of the Cullom Act. Let me invite your honor's attention to the substance of section 15. That is a section which provides that the Commission may make an investigation as to whether a common carrier has done a wrong to any other citizen, taking the broadest terms; whether the common carrier has violated any of the laws and rules of the Cullom Act to the detriment of a citizen. It is provided that the Commission shall hear and determine in that case, and then if it feels that a case is made out shall give notice to the carrier to cease and desist from the violation of law which is found to obtain and to make reparation for the injury. It is under that section that the great work of the Interstate Commerce Commission is done. In effect, that is an order by the Interstate Commerce Commission, although it is not clothed in the form of an order.

Now, let me go, if your honor please, to section 20. Let me invite your attention to the provisions of that section. Your honor asked of me my view of the meaning of the words "lawful requirement." The answer to that is found in this section. In section 12 the Commission had been given power to require, by subpœna, testimony and evidence. In section 20 the Commission is given power to require information without subpœna. Let me read it: The "Commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, to fix the time and prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information." Let me stop there. I have been through this act from its first to its last letter, and it is the only case in which the Commission is given power to "require" anything, save only the provision in section 12, where the Commission is given power to require testimony and evidence by subpœna. The law itself makes the distinction. The evidence and the testimony is required by subpœna. Information sought for under the provisions of section 20 is required by the Commission without a subpœna. It is a lawful requirement.

The COURT. Is there a duty to answer?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. Without a subpœna?

Mr. MOODY. Yes; it is a lawful requirement, but it is not a requirement by subpœna.

The COURT. Well, then, is the immunity as broad as the liability?

Mr. MOODY. Not at all. If human language can do it, if the will of the legislature can be heard and obeyed, your honor, I think I shall demonstrate that there is no immunity given, either for the information which is obtained or for the returns or information furnished in obedience to the lawful requirements, but that the immunity is given solely for the evidence and testimony furnished in obedience to the power of the Commission to require such evidence and testimony by a subpœna.

The COURT. Although the citizen may be punished for refusing?

Mr. MOODY. If it is lawful requirement; yes. I will come to that.

The COURT. He may be punished for refusing to answer the lawful requirements?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. And the Commission may not subpœna?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. Go ahead and punish him?

Mr. MOODY. Yes; if it is lawful. I am not afraid of my logic. Of course it is not lawful; he can not be condemned for failing to answer a question under their requirement which has any tendency to incriminate him, because he is not bound to do that. He can not be compelled to do that anywhere. He need not claim his privilege in the sense of a witness; but suppose he shows to the court that he declined to obey this lawful requirement because it would have a tendency to compel him to produce evidence against himself, he would be acquitted precisely upon the principle that Boyd (116 U. S., 616) was acquitted by the Supreme Court of the United States. In that case Congress had enacted a law which in effect compelled the citizen to produce evidence which would tend to incriminate.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. The requirement——

Mr. MOODY. Please let me finish my thought. And the Supreme Court held that that was not a lawful obligation put upon him by the law and that the act which sought to do it was unconstitutional.

Now, let me go to section 20, a little further, and see what section 20 is. The question which we have just been discussing is apart from the discussion of this section, because this section authorizes the Commission to require only reports from all common carriers. No; I withdraw that. The discussion we have just had is in point, because a common carrier need not be a corporation, of course. The Commission is authorized to require annual reports from all common carriers and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the Commission may need information. Now, let us see what the annual reports are.

"Such annual report shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipments; the number of employees and the salaries paid each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements; the earnings and receipts," and so on; the operating and other expenses, balance to profit and loss, and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier. "Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares or freights, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts with other common carriers, as the commission may require." That is, these reports, which are made obligatory upon the carrier, subject of course to his constitutional rights, and which the Commission is authorized to obtain, must contain information as to the rates or regulations concerning fare or freight; that is, information upon every subject relevant to prosecutions for rebates or discriminations, and also agreements, arrangements, and contracts with other common carriers, and therefore information that is relevant upon every combination made by a common carrier in violation of the Sherman Act. Now, in that connection in no way is immunity given.

The COURT. Isn't it possible, under your contention, to use the citizen without putting him in position to get the benefit of the immunity?

Mr. MOODY. No; I think it is not. I think it is not, sir.

The COURT. Either that or else he has got to claim it.

Mr. MOODY. Well, certainly, if you proceed upon the theory that information can be given—can grant immunity outside testimony and evidence under oath—if you proceed upon the defendants' theory of course he has got to claim immunity. Of course it is preposterous to suppose that a governmental officer going around and investigating what are presumed to be the lawful operations of individuals and corporations in the conduct of their business should suddenly find himself entrapped into conferring an immunity which he never intended to confer, nobody thought that he ever was conferring, unless somebody had put him on his guard by making a claim that he had entered upon a field out of which immunity would grow.

The COURT. General Moody, take the converse. Congress legislates for the mass of citizenship, the ignorant as well as the skillful and the alert.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. Isn't there much more danger that your rule would entrap an ignorant citizen than that any officer should be entrapped by the citizen?

Mr. MOODY. No; I think not.

The COURT. Would not the citizen have to be a skillful citizen to meet your rule?

Mr. MOODY. No; I think not.

The COURT. Wouldn't he have to have legal advice?

Mr. MOODY. Well——

The COURT. I simply throw it out for your consideration.

Mr. MOODY. No; I think not, because he would ordinarily be called as a witness, and there, according to my concession, he would be in a position where the immunity would grow out of the testimony itself, without any necessity on his part of claiming it.

If your honor please, there is no hardship in asking people who have violated the law to claim the privilege which the Constitution gives to them. The law was not passed for the encouragement of crime, and it ought not to be administered for the encouragement of crime. If these people are innocent they have nothing to fear.

The COURT. I would like to have you, before you conclude, address yourself to the purposes of the act—the broad purposes of the act.

Mr. MOODY. Yes; I shall most certainly do that, your honor.

The COURT. Do you care to take the five minutes' recess?

Mr. MOODY. Yes, sir.

(Recess for five minutes.)

Mr. MOODY. If a statute should in terms provide that any governmental body might acquire information from any citizen and then say that no citizen should be excused from answering any question on the ground that it might incriminate him, and stop there, the statute would be obviously unconstitutional, and the same chances of entrapping people into answers would exist in that case as would exist in the illustration which your honor presented to me. To show clearly how Congress distinguished between the requirement by subpœna and the requirement of reports and information under section 20, I now proceed to show to your honor the different methods of enforcing those two powers of the Commission, which were provided distinctly by the act.

Your honor already knows that under section 12 the power to enforce obedience to a subpœna to testify or to produce evidence is vested in a court, to which application may be made in case of contumacy or refusal to obey the subpœna, and the court is authorized and empowered to issue an order compelling the witness to obey the subpœna.

The power to compel obedience to the requirements to furnish a report or information is contained in another section altogether—section 16. Section 16 says this: "Whenever any common carrier, as defined in and subject to the provisions of this act, shall violate, or refuse or neglect to obey or perform any lawful order or requirement"—the order is such as is contained in section 15 and the requirement is such as is contained in section 20—"to obey or perform any lawful order or requirement of the Commission created by this act, not founded upon a controversy requiring a trial by jury," the Commission or the person interested in the performance, obedience to such order, or the obedience to such requirement, may apply in a summary way by petition to the circuit court of the United States sitting in equity in the judicial district in which the common carrier complained of has its principal office. And then there follows in the act provisions for the trial of that controversy.

The act carefully goes on and recognizes that some such order or requirement might, according to the course of the common law, demand a trial by jury. So it says further in the next clause of the same section, "If the matters involved in any such order or requirement of said Commission are founded upon a controversy requiring a trial by jury," then it shall be lawful for the Commission or the person interested to apply by petition to the circuit court of the United States sitting as a court of law, and the procedure consequent upon that application is prescribed in detail in the statute.

Let me, then, for the purpose of showing how clearly Congress intended to distinguish between sworn testimony and evidence and the unsworn answers to requirements—lawful requirements—again emphasize the fact that the power to compel compliance with the subpœna is provided for in section 12 of the act, and the court is there authorized to make an order, while the power to compel a compliance with a lawful requirement is contained in section 16 of the act, a distinction being made between a controversy requiring a trial by jury and one not. In the one case the court sits as a court of law and in the other case it sits as a court of equity. Could anything more clearly indicate that Congress at least had in view a different subject-matter, with different consequences, to which the claim of privilege and the claim of immunity growing out of the privilege did not apply at all when it made it incumbent upon the citizen to obey the "requirement" of the Commission?

There are, therefore, three sources of information or three sources of knowledge open to the Commission: First, the information provided for in the first part of section 12, which is knowledge in its broadest form; second, the reports and answers to inquiries which the Commission may require, as provided by section 20, and, third, the sworn testimony or evidence of a witness, which is provided for in the latter part of section 12, and from which the excuse of incrimination is taken away and the immunity from prosecution is substituted in its stead. And it is the Government's contention that the immunity under this act is offered only under the third of these general sources of knowledge to the Commission, because it is only there demanded as an equivalent to the constitutional privilege, and it is only there, therefore, given. If there is anything unconstitutional in the other part of the act, your honor will not proceed at a trial at nisi prius upon any theory of unconstitutionality.

I have said that the defendants have contended that all the information and the reports give immunity, because they are given under the compulsion of the law. They can stand upon no narrower ground, because, as I have said, compulsion in fact was not exercised by Garfield. The only compulsion consisted in the fact that he was the visible presence and embodiment of the compulsion of the law. It is not that he compelled, but that his power compelled. It is his power to act, and not any action which he took, which is claimed to be compulsion in this case. Let us see where that contention leads. Mr. Rosenthal, in his most admirable argument, was not afraid of his logic. He carried it to its extreme. At the close of his first day's argument I asked him this question:

"The Interstate Commerce Commission has pursued the practice since its origin in the exercise of these broad powers, which I think you have accurately described, of obtaining from common carriers a great amount of information relating to the conduct of their business. That information much nearer touches the question of unlawful discrimination and much nearer touches the question of unlawful combination with other roads than the evidence in this case, as I understand it, touches the allegation of combination. Now, would it be your contention that the information obtained by the Interstate Commerce Commission in that way has given these railroads, or the officers furnishing information, immunity from prosecution under the law?"

Mr. ROSENTHAL. "I can answer that at once. The question as put is incomplete, because it fails to indicate how the information was obtained."

Mr. MOODY. "In the exercise of their authority as a commission."

Mr. ROSENTHAL. "Yes; I know; but how in the exercise of their authority? Broadly speaking, I should say that if the information is obtained from any individual in the exercise of the granted authority, the authority granted under section 12, immunity would follow."

Mr. MOODY. "My question includes that assumption that the information is obtained in the exercise of the authority contained in this grant of power."

Mr. ROSENTHAL. "Yes."

Mr. MOODY. "I am very glad to get your answer."

Mr. Brown in his eloquent appeal for his client made the claim that anybody who performed a duty imposed upon him by law could not be said to act voluntarily. He said, "he only consents who has the right to refuse." That is to say, the man who keeps his contracts, the man who pays his debts, the man who refrains from stealing his neighbor's purse or debauching his neighbor's wife is acting under the compulsion of the law and can not be said to be a voluntary agent. It is an abuse of words. Is there no such thing as a voluntary obedience to the law? Action in obedience to the law is only involuntary when the law in addition to delivering its commands exercises the strong arm of compulsion to enforce them. The power to compel is quite different from the compulsion itself, which is the exercise of that power.

Mr. Miller claimed that where the law prescribes the duty of testifying, if one voluntarily, without invitation, comes forward with any statement concerning any offense in which he may have participated, he may be regarded as making that statement under the compulsion of the law and that where immunity is provided by the law he is entitled to that immunity. I took his exact words and they were these: "That which is done in pursuance of a legal duty or obligation obviously is done under legal compulsion."

Mr. MILLER. It was somewhere along there stated to be where the law required a specific——

Mr. MOODY. Yes; I understood that to be so; that you did not take so broad a ground as Judge Brown took. That where the law required some specific conduct on the part of a citizen——

Mr. MILLER. Specific act.

Mr. MOODY. Specific act. If he voluntarily and without invitation complied with the law he may be said to be acting under compulsion.

Mr. MILLER. I think that is too broad.

Mr. MOODY. No; I think it is not. I do not wonder that my learned friend shrinks from the consequences of his statement, because I will show in a moment that his claim is based upon no authority and no reason. It is utterly at variance with the constitutional privilege, and utterly at variance with the terms of the immunity act itself. He gave an illustration in order to make his meaning clear. He said if there were an immunity act with reference to offenses committed in the postal service, and an employee of the post-office here had committed a crime, and came to the proper person without any invitation whatever, apparently voluntarily in every respect, except that he was obeying the law, and made a statement of his offense, that from that statement alone he would obtain immunity. That was the illustration given. It is a most extraordinary——

Mr. MILLER. It was added to that if the law——

Mr. MOODY. If the law gave immunity.

Mr. MILLER. If the law compelled him to do that specific act.

Mr. MOODY. If the law compelled him to do it.

Mr. MILLER. That specific act, and he went in obedience to the law and did it.

Mr. MOODY. The contention here is that this information in its broadest terms was furnished in obedience to the compulsion of the law to do that specific act. Let us see where that most extraordinary claim leads to. What would be the consequences? We might suppose that the confessions and statements in obedience to the law might be made at Washington, made possibly to the Interstate Commerce Commission, possibly to the Commissioner of Corporations, possibly to the Attorney-General. This is a great discovery of my learned friend, for which uncounted generations of captains of industry will thank him. Washington will become the Alsatia to which they can resort for immunity for their offenses. It will be much easier, much better, instead of running away from a subpœna to run toward the governmental agent and serve a confession upon him.

Anybody in this land who is now seeking to avoid the service of a subpœna will thank my learned friend for giving him a very much shorter road to travel if he need only travel to the representative of the Government whose laws he has violated and obtain his immunity. Washington would become a great resort, not only in winter, but in summer. All the people who are violating the laws of the land may go there at intervals and obtain their immunity. All they have to do is to go there in obedience to the compulsion of this law. All the officers of a corporation have to do is to go there in obedience to the compulsion of this law and serve upon the Commissioner of Corporations a statement with regard to their conduct and obtain immunity. They can do it at intervals. The law is a license to commit crime. Now, I can fancy those gentlemen gathering together there. I can fancy Mr. Swift and Mr. Armour, and their journey to Washington, and their meeting with some other great magnate who has been there, and who has washed, in what I may call the "Miller's bath," because they will go there, as to Carlsbad and the French Lick Springs, in order to cleanse themselves of misdoing. I can imagine them meeting and saying, "Good morning; good morning, Brother Rockefeller, have you had your immunity bath this morning?" Look at the absurdity of it. [Laughter.]

The COURT. The bailiff will preserve order. If there is any further demonstration in the court room the court room will be cleared.

Mr. MOODY. Look at the absurd consequences, which I am not overstating at all, if anyone has a right, in obedience to this law, voluntarily to make a statement and thereby claim immunity from it. And yet it is absolutely essential that our friends should resort to that ground in order to maintain their case.

Now, I find further confirmation of the view that immunity arises out of the sworn testimony, and the sworn testimony alone, of a witness, in the words of the act of 1893. Let me consider that act generally in the first place. It speaks of "witnesses." It speaks of "testifying." It speaks of "producing evidence." It speaks of "subpœna." It speaks of "perjury." All these are terms of art, having a well-known meaning. Why should they be warped from the natural significance which attaches to them, especially, when the giving to them their natural significance is in harmony, as I have sought to show, with the whole scheme of the law?

What does the word "testimony," for instance, mean when it is used in describing the statements of a witness before a tribunal authorized to administer an oath? How false a construction of the word it is to give it another meaning than the natural meaning which the law attaches to it. If it had been intended by the statute to give immunity for information, it would have been the simplest thing in the world to have added that word. I am not going to give definitions of "testimony" and "evidence," and the "production of evidence" and "witness" and "subpœna." They are all well known to your honor. They have but one meaning, and that is the meaning which the Government attaches to them. We are to consider that we are not reading a novel or an essay. We are reading a statute. And there is nowhere in the wide world where words are employed after a greater or more careful scrutiny of real meaning than they are in a statute, because that statute must be compact. And the rule established by all courts from the beginning of reports of the decisions of the courts is that words should be taken in their natural meaning, and that words having a legal significance should in all cases be interpreted as having their legal meaning. Suppose anyone had suggested in the act of 1893, after "testimony," to have inserted "under oath." The body in which that amendment was proposed would have said that it was surplusage; would have said there is no need of qualifying "testimony" by the words "under oath," because testimony is of necessity under oath. What is the reason, what is the underlying reason, why a corporation can not get immunity, as the court decided last Monday it could not? It could furnish all sorts of information. It can furnish returns, but it can not give testimony, because it can not be sworn as a witness. A corporation is a person for very many purposes, as is already apparent to your honor, not only from the citation of authorities here, but from your honor's own investigations; but it can not be conceded to be within the word "person" where it is used in such a manner as to indicate a person who can hold up his right hand and take the oath.

It is our misfortune that we have not been able to make ourselves clear upon our position as to the effect of the proviso in the act of 1893. This proviso: "Provided, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying." I do not claim that this proviso creates the offense of perjury or that one indicted for perjury in his testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission would be punished by virtue of that provision of the law. It simply recognizes the existence of perjury. Let us see the immunity clause: "But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said Commission, or in obedience to its subpœna," etc.: "Provided, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying."

The exact effect of that provision is to indicate clearly that the testimony out of which the immunity must grow is testimony out of which a prosecution for perjury may grow. "So testifying." Testifying before the Commission and producing evidence before the Commission. Providing that a person "so testifying" may be punished for perjury. It is a clear indication of the intent of Congress that the testimony out of which the immunity grows is testimony upon which, if false, a prosecution for perjury may be based.

I am not claiming of necessity that the subpœna which the Commission is authorized to issue to compel testimony and evidence is an indispensable prerequisite to the giving of such testimony and evidence out of which immunity may grow any more than I am contending that this provision with regard to perjury is a provision by the terms of which a prosecution for perjury may be instituted. I am contending that both of those provisions are of significance in demonstrating to your honor the meaning of the words "testimony" and "evidence," which lie between them. We have at the entrance of the field of immunity a gateway marked "subpœna." We have at its exit a gateway marked "perjury." Should we not expect to find in the field itself the words we do find—"testimony" and "evidence?" Should we not expect to find that the kind of information obtained by subpœna, the kind of information which is capable of being punished by perjury, is testimonial in its nature?

Let us see. Let me give a simple illustration of what I mean. Here is a field of information, there [indicating]. Nothing about testimony. Nothing about evidence. Nothing about any compulsory process. Here is a field of information and reports [indicating], made in obedience to lawful requirements. Nothing about evidence. Nothing about testimony. Nothing about subpœna. Nothing about perjury. And in connection with either of those fields the word "immunity" is not used at all. Here [indicating] is the great field in which the plant "immunity" grows, and it is marked "evidence;" it is marked "testimony;" and it is bounded on the one side by a fence called "subpœna" and on the other side by a fence called "perjury." Can anyone doubt the nature of the territory that lies between those two boundaries?

I find still further confirmation of my interpretation in the penal section of the act of 1893. Let me first deliberately read the whole of it. [Reading:]

"Any person who shall neglect or refuse to attend and testify, or to answer any lawful inquiry, or to produce books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents, if in his power to do so, in obedience to the subpœna or lawful requirement of the Commission, shall be guilty of an offense, and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished," etc.

I have shown that the Cullom Act contemplates two distinct methods of obtaining knowledge or informtaion from books and documents. The first method is that pursued when the Commission, in conformity with its powers, requires, by a subpœna to a witness, the production of books, documents, etc. And second, where the carrier itself is, in obedience to the lawful requirement of the Commission, without subpœna, directed to furnish it with the substance of those books and documents or to answer inquiries with respect to them.

I have argued that to the first of those powers mentioned—namely, the power to require by subpœna the production of papers and the testimony of witnesses—there was attached the privilege of immunity in exchange for the constitutional privilege which was taken away. I have shown that in connection with the production—the answer to the lawful requirement, by reports or otherwise—no immunity is given. And I have argued the matter of the separation in the law, a separation clearly followed through the whole scheme of the law, which enforces the power of the Commission in one case in one way by one section, and enforces the power of the Commission in the other case in another way by another section. I say I have argued, from the separation of those two functions of the Commission, and from the attachment of the privilege to one of the functions, and its exclusion from the other function, that immunity is given in the one case and withheld in the other.

Now, if your honor please, if I can show that that separation that was made in the original Cullom Act is recognized and brought forward and carried into the very act of 1893 itself, the very act in which immunity is given, and that in the one case immunity is given, and in the other it is withheld, I have completed my demonstration. I proceed to do that now. The penal clause makes it an offense to do four things: First, to neglect or refuse to attend and testify; second, to answer any lawful inquiry; third, to produce books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents in obedience to the subpœna of the Commission; fourth, to produce books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents in obedience to the lawful requirements of the Commission.

The COURT. What is the difference between three and four?

Mr. MOODY. The third is to refuse to produce books and documents in obedience to the subpœna of the Commission——

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. And the fourth is that it is an offense to refuse to produce books and documents in obedience to the lawful requirement of the Commission.

Now, then, I have brought into the very act of 1893 the distinction which was created by the Cullom Act and carried all through the scheme of the act. The refusal to produce documents in obedience to a subpœna and the refusal to produce documents in obedience to a lawful requirement are both punishable by the law. If a person refuses to produce documents or books or papers in obedience to the subpœna of the Commission he is indicted in one form of indictment. The indictment would allege that he had been duly subpœnaed by the Commission to produce certain books and papers and that he had neglected and refused to do so. If he had refused to produce books and papers in obedience to the lawful requirement the indictment would allege that the Commission had lawfully required him to produce those papers and he had failed to do so. The offenses are absolutely distinct, and an entirely different consideration would arise on the trial of an indictment under those two forms. So I say again, and I ask your honor to follow me there, that in the very act of 1893 the distinction which I have demonstrated to exist under the original Cullom Act between the requirement of the subpœna and the lawful requirement of the Commission, is recognized, maintained, brought forward, and put into the very law of immunity itself. In the penal section the two methods of producing documents and books are distinguished and separately stated, and each one is made an offense. Let us go back, however, to the immunity section, three or four lines down, and we shall find that while immunity is given where a witness produces documents in obedience to the subpœna, it is withheld where he produces documents in obedience to the lawful requirement. Because the language is that he shall have immunity where he produces documentary evidence "before said Commission, or in obedience to its subpœna, or the subpœna of either of them." The first word "or" must be used in the sense of "either," or it could have no possible meaning. The section would then read "either in obedience to its subpœna or the subpœna of either of them." The immunity is given where the documents are produced in obedience to the subpœna of the Commission or either of the Commissioners; but it is not given where the documents are produced in obedience to the lawful requirement of the Commission.

Mr. MILLER. Under that law——

Mr. MOODY. Wait a minute. And if it is said that this is a fine distinction, it is the distinction the law itself makes.

Mr. MILLER. Learned counsel did not read all of it.

Mr. MOODY. I read every word that is material, and I would like you to say what there is material that I did not.

Mr. MILLER. You did not read all of the alternatives.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. There are two others.

Mr. MOODY. Oh, "in any such case or proceeding." "In any such case or proceeding." Brother Rosenthal disposed of that the other day.

He showed that prior to the act of 1893, this act under consideration, the privilege was taken away and the substitute of immunity given in its place only where testimony or evidence was produced before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The act of 1893 does the same thing in any cause under the interstate-commerce law in any court.

Those words mean—"in any cause or proceeding"—that the immunity is in a jurisdiction broader than that of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but they have nothing to do with the character and the nature of the limitations of the immunity itself. It grows out of the testimony or evidence given in obedience to the subpœna of the Commission, or in obedience to the subpœna of either one of the Commissioners, or given in any cause in any court. The omission of the immunity growing out of documents produced in obedience to the "lawful requirement" is not only significant, but it is absolutely conclusive, because the distinction between the production of books under those two circumstances is brought forward, maintained, and expressed in the clearest words in the act itself.

Mr. MILLER. Isn't the proceeding in section 16, to which counsel has referred, one of the proceedings referred to in the act of February 11?

Mr. MOODY. Not at all. Not at all. We are not engaged in any such proceeding as that here at all.

Mr. MILLER. You are engaged in a proceeding to mutilate the act?

Mr. MOODY. I am engaged in interpreting the act and in asserting the meaning, the plain meaning, of words never before in any court in the land disputed until this case. I think, may it please your honor, that if words can do it, if the application of right principles to the interpretation of statutes can do it, I have demonstrated that the immunity conferred by the act of 1893 can only grow out of some sworn testimony or evidence under the provisions of the interstate-commerce law——

Mr. COWIN. Will the Attorney-General permit me——

Mr. MOODY. Just a moment. Later I shall claim, that being so, neither Mr. Garfield nor his subordinates, nor any other person, can amend that act or extend its benefits to any man who is not within its terms.

Mr. COWIN. May I ask just a question before you leave that?

Mr. MOODY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COWIN. Suppose Mr. Garfield went to A and said, "I am prepared to investigate your packing business. There is certain information you will have to give me as I am not able to get it elsewhere. I have the power to compel you to give me this information, and, if necessary, I will use that power, so you can see you will have to comply with my demands." He says, "I know you are required to get this information, and that I must give it; that you can and will compel me, and for that reason I comply with your demand."

He has been informed that probably he ought to have a subpœna and be sworn, and he says, "Will you please hand me a subpœna?" And a subpœna is handed to him. "Will you please swear me?" And he is sworn. He gave the information fully and truthfully. They then went to B and made the same requirement. B made the same answers. B did not know—just as truthfully, and just as fully—B did not know anything about a subpœna or an oath, and he didn't say anything about it. Now, is there any difference between the two parties on the question of immunity?

Mr. MOODY. Of course there is a difference; just as there is between two persons, one of whom stands upon his right to remain silent, who makes no confession, makes no answer to the officer, and the other of whom does not remain silent, does testify, and does make a confession, and does make incriminating statements. Now, it is no answer to an application of the rules of law to the man who was not silent that the man was ignorant of the provisions of the law of the land and didn't know them as well as my learned friends know them here. As I said, the act—the laws are not passed for the encouragement of crime or the protection of offenders.

Mr. MILLER. Nor to entrap them.

Mr. MOODY. No; nor to entrap them. I want to consider that these defendants are innocent until they are proven guilty. They have the right under the law so to be considered. I am willing to give them every presumption that belongs to them. If they are innocent, they have nothing to fear from any inquiry. If they are guilty, it is no burden or hardship upon them to ask them to comply with the conditions and burdens of immunity which Congress has enacted.

There is just another confirmation which I think comes to my contention from the absurdity of the consequences which would follow from the adoption of the rule contended for by the defendants. I invite your honor's attention to section 10 of the act, which creates offenses.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Section 10?

Mr. MOODY. Yes; section 10. The act in various preceding sections had made it unlawful to practice any unjust discrimination, or give undue or unreasonable preference, or fail to give proper facilities for the interchange of traffic, or to discriminate between connecting lines, or to violate the long and short haul provision, or to pool their earnings, or to divide their traffic, or to fail to print schedules or rates, or to reduce or advance rates without certain prescribed preliminary notice, or to file all public rates and fares and charges, or to enter into and contract to prevent the shipment of freight from being continuous.

Section 10 makes the disobedience of those provisions of the law an offense; misdemeanors. Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or any director, officer, receiver, or trustee, or the lessee or agent, or person acting for a corporation who is a common carrier, who shall willfully do, or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer or permit to be done, any matter, act, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or shall aid or abet it, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, which shall be punishable by certain penalties prescribed in the law. And any common carrier who shall be guilty of false billing, false classification, false using, or false report, or who by any device or means shall practice discrimination, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished in the manner prescribed by law.

Those offenses are largely those of discrimination. The first foundation to every prosecution under section 10 would be the information furnished to the Commission under section 20 of the act, because section 20 authorizes the Commission to require from the carrier information in relation to rates, or regulations concerning fares and freights, or arrangements or contracts with other common carriers. There have been many prosecutions—and this is, perhaps, an answer to my learned friend's question this morning as to the practice—there have been many prosecutions under section 10 and many convictions under section 10. Your honor is familiar, perhaps, with many of them; and no one ever thought that he was immune from prosecution because, being an officer of a railroad, under section 20 of the interstate-commerce act, he had furnished information which was material upon the question of that prosecution—not only material, but vitally material, on the question of that prosecution.

The interpretation of the act which my distinguished friends laid before your honor leads to the conclusion that Congress in one section of the act created offenses and prescribed their punishment and in another section of the act gave the Commission authority to require from the carriers, and the officers of the carriers, the very information which would be relevant upon the indictment, and that by doing that had rendered every prosecution under the penal section of the code utterly impossible.

I wonder what the distinguished author of that act, the venerable Senator from this State, whose name is inseparably connected with it, and to whom it brings one of his greatest titles to fame, would say to that interpretation; would say to an interpretation which accused him of drawing and fostering and permitting and enacting legislation which was contradictory and absurd.

I am not proposing to urge upon your honor the contention that was so ably argued by my friend the district attorney, that immunity can not be obtained except after an order of court. That is one possible aspect of this case. I am willing to concede, for the purposes of the argument, and I am willing to say that on the whole it is my opinion, from a study of this act, that immunity may be obtained short of the compulsory order of the court. I am willing to concede that the subpœna of the Commission and the imposition of the oath upon the witness by the Commission creates an obligation on his part to testify to which he may yield, although the law, for his protection, gives him the right to appeal to the court. If he does yield to the constraint of subpœna and the oath, and does give the testimony relating to an offense with which he may be subsequently charged, I am ready to concede that he would get the immunity growing out of such testimony. I think this may be inferred from the Brimson case (Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447), a case which I believe has not received the attention from counsel which its importance deserves. It is a case which deals with this whole procedure, and deals with it under a challenge by a party who had been summoned under the provisions of the Cullom Act. In that case the Commission was engaged in examining whether rebates were given or discriminations practiced in favor of the Illinois Steel Company by the railroads running out of Chicago in various directions; the claim being that discrimination was brought about under the device of switching railroads, which were attached to the plant of the Illinois Steel Company.

Those switching railroads were incorporated—five of them were incorporated—some, I think, under the laws of this State, and Brimson was the president of all five of the switching railroads, and the question was asked of him with respect to the interest of the Illinois Steel Company in these switching railroads. He declined to answer, basing his declination on the claim that the whole provision was unconstitutional. The circuit court for this circuit sustained, as your honor well remembers, the claim of Brimson and his associates; and the case then went for final adjudication to the Supreme Court of the United States. The question there was, whether these powers, given to the court to aid the Interstate Commerce Commission to obtain testimony of witnesses who had been subpœnaed by them, were judicial powers; it being contended, on the one hand, that they were judicial powers and could properly, in case of dispute, be exercised by the judicial department of the Government of the United States. It was claimed, on the other hand, that this legislation under the Cullom Act made the courts mere assistants of an executive and administrative body, and that no such power as that within the Constitution could be conferred on the courts.

The majority of the court held that where the Commission had issued its subpœna and brought its witness before it and imposed the oath upon the witness and the witness then disputed, for any reason, the right of the Commission to interrogate him and obtain testimony from him, the Interstate Commerce Commission insisting it had that right, that the dispute between the two created a case or controversy within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and that the settlement of that case or controversy was an appropriate exercise of the judicial functions. That is what the case decided. I ask your honor's attention to a little of the reasoning of the case. I ask your honor's indulgence, for I believe this is the last book of any kind to which I shall refer. On page 476 Mr. Justice Harlan, giving the opinion of the court, said:

"Upon everyone, therefore, who owes allegiance to the United States, or who is within its jurisdiction, enjoying the protection that its Government affords, rests an obligation to respect the national will as thus expressed in conformity with the Constitution. As every citizen is bound to obey the law and to yield obedience to the constituted authorities acting within the law, this power conferred upon the Commission imposes upon anyone summoned by that body to appear and testify, the duty of appearing and testifying, and upon anyone required to produce such books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents, the duty of producing them, if the testimony is sought, and the books, papers, etc., called for relate to the matter under investigation, if such matter is one which the Commission is legally entitled to investigate, and if the witness is not excused, on some personal grounds, from doing what the Commission requires at his hands.

It is from that language that I have reached the conclusion which I stated to your honor, that the issuance of the subpœna to a person to become a witness and produce documents, or give testimony, imposes upon him a sufficient legal compulsion, to which, if he yileds, there being no dispute about it, he is entitled to the immunity given to him by the express terms of the act; that the provision authorizing him safely to dispute the authority of the Commission is given to him for his sake, and because the Commission is not a judicial body empowered to pass upon the rights of the people of the United States. And this consideration appears very fully from the language of Mr. Justice Harlan.

The COURT. Perhaps this is as good a time as any to adjourn.

Mr. MOODY. I have every reason, if your honor please, to believe that I can conclude this afternoon, but I want to be sure about it, and if your honor will give me fifteen minutes more now, and shorten the recess to that extent, I am sure I can.

The COURT. Very well; proceed.

Mr. MOODY. If your honor will call my attention to it at the expiration of that time.

Now, in describing the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. Justice Harlan uses this language, page 485:

"The inquiry whether a witness before the Commission is bound to answer a particular question propounded to him, or to produce books, papers, etc., in his possession and called for by that body, is one that can not be committed to a subordinate administrative or a subordinate executive tribunal for final determination. Such a body could not, under our system of Government and consistently with due process of law, be invested with authority to compel obedience to its orders by a judgment of fine or imprisonment."

And again, on page 489:

"If there is any legal reason why appellees should not be required to answer the questions put to them, or to produce the books, papers, etc., demanded of them, their rights can be recognized and enforced by the court below when it enters upon the consideration of the merits of the questions presented by the petition."

So, then, we have a clear characterization of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as a body not acting judicially and not capable of passing on the rights of the people of the United States. I have contended that the only ground under the Cullom Act and its supplemental act upon which a person could obtain immunity is that he should have been subjected to testimonial compulsion. I have emphasized both ideas. I have claimed that from the field of the constitutional privilege Congress in the immunity act has brought forward the two fundamental ideas of compulsion—compulsion to testify as a witness.

I come now to a consideration of the act which creates the Bureau of Corporations. It is agreed upon all hands that every limitation which surrounds the granting of immunity under the Cullom Act and under the act of 1893 is applicable to the immunity which may grow out of any action by the Commissioner of Corporations. It is the contention of the Government, however, that there is one other important limitation rendered necessary by the difference between the constitution and functions of the two bodies, and that important difference is contained in the last sentence of the clause of section 6, in which immunity is provided.

This seems to be a very convenient place for me to stop, your honor, at this point. Perhaps it would be better to stop here.

The COURT. Very well.

Whereupon a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day.

MARCH 20, 1906—2 p. m.

Whereupon court convened pursuant to recess.

Mr. MOODY. At the adjournment of court this noon I had concluded my discussion of the immunity which is conferred by the action of the Interstate Commission under the Cullom law. I had endeavored to prove that that immunity was coextensive with the constitutional privilege, and as that privilege attached only to a witness under oath the statutory substitute of immunity attached only to a witness under oath. I have endeavored to show that both by a careful study of that part of the act which expressly relates to immunity and by a development of the whole scheme of the act. I had concluded that the Cullom Act was not a delusion or a mockery or a snare set for the unwary feet either of the citizen or of the Government, but a coherent act, effective in its dealings with the great problems to which it relates, protecting alike the operations of the Government through all governmental agency and every just right that every citizen may claim. I have regarded that discussion as conclusive of this case as a matter of law.

I pointed out that it was in agreement between all the counsel that every limitation which surrounded the immunity which grew out of the Cullom Act would surround any immunity which might grow out of the act creating the Bureau of Corporations, and I have advanced for your honor's consideration the claim that there was another limitation, another restriction of immunity in the act creating the Bureau of Corporations, and that that limitation existed in the last sentence of the clause by which the immunity is conferred, and was created alike in the interest of the citizen and in the interest of the Government. I have said to your honor that that restriction—the discussion of which I shall soon approach—was born out of the differences in the constitution of the two governmental bodies. Let me allude to those differences briefly.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is the organ through which the Federal Government exercises the undoubted governmental power of the regulation of common carriers engaged in business between the States. It conducts hearings; it arrives at decisions; it gives orders; it makes requirements, all under the superficial similarity to the action of a court of justice. I say superficial similarity because, as appears very well from the Brimson case, the judicial department of the Government is essentially different from any body, administrative or executive in its nature, such as is the Interstate Commission. It acquires its knowledge through information or through returns or through testimony, and that knowledge is acquired for the purpose of aiding that body in the performance of its own duties.

On the other hand, the Bureau of Corporations has a totally different purposes, which has been frequently pointed out by your honor's observations from the bench. In a word, it was constituted for the purpose of making a governmental study of the economical conditions which have arisen out of the lawful operations of corporations. The existence in great number of corporations, sometimes of great power, has been, on the one hand, of inestimable benefit in the development of the country, and, upon the other hand, has brought to the people of the country questions of great moment for their consideration and solution. The purposes of this governmental study were to acquire the broadest knowledge of existing conditions, under the laws as they stand to-day, in order that that knowledge could be communicated to the President and through him to Congress and through Congress to the country so that the conditions which this information disclosed might be studied by the Congress and by the people whom they represent, to the end that, where need may be, remedial legislation could be furnished. The functions of this Bureau were expressly confined to the study of corporations. They had nothing to do with individuals, except so far as individuals must of necessity govern, control, and direct the operations of corporations. Let us for a moment, for the purposes of illustration, consider some of the important questions that the Bureau was constituted to study. The question of overcapitalization, one of the great problems of our time; the question of the propriety of the ownership by one corporation of stock in another; lawful in some of the States and unlawful in some of the other States, one of the most important of pending questions; the operation of private car lines by any other corporation than one which is under the duty and obligation and subject to the restrictions of common carriers; and the desirability of enforced publicity in the proper sense of the word, for in the proper sense of the word the act creating the Bureau of Corporations does not give publicity.

When that act was passed your honor may well remember that between the two Houses there was a dispute upon that subject. The bill as it passed the House of Representatives provided for publicity in the true sense—the acquisition by way of return, or in any other way that might be specified, of information from corporations for publication—so that the people could resort to that for their information. On the other hand, the Senate was unwilling to go as far as that, and confined the use of the information obtained through the study of the Bureau to delivery to the President and allowed him to determine what degree of publicity should be given to it. The important question of the desirability of a Federal license for corporations doing an interstate business, and the incorporation by one State of a corporation authorized to do business in other States, one of the great questions raised by the economic conditions created by the existence of corporations (because, as your honor well knows, some States have gone so far as to create a corporation with powers and duties so broad that they have been unwilling to authorize the exercise of the franchise of that corporation in the State in which it was created, and have confined its powers and their exercise to the other States of the Union), were appropriate questions for study by the Bureau. I might go on, but these questions to which I have alluded are sufficient to indicate the general nature of the study which was undertaken by the creation of this Bureau. The Bureau was not designed to deal with the unlawful acts of corporations. That was left, as before, with the Department of Justice. If that Department needed strengthening, it could be strengthened as it was strengthened under the act of 1903, which in another connection has been brought to your honor's attention, where money was put at the disposal of the Department of Justice, and that Department was authorized in the cases described therein to employ special counsel and special agents.

Now, having in view that great fundamental and controlling purpose of Congress in the creation of that Bureau, let us see by what steps in the act itself the Bureau was built up. All the law relating to it is contained in section 6. In the first clause there is created a Commissioner of Corporations and one Deputy Commissioner, and one only, and in passing I may say that that distinguishes the case from that brought to your honor's attention by Brother Rosenthal the other day, where the act of Congress had authorized the collectors throughout the country to appoint as many deputy collectors as they saw fit. Congress appointed one Commissioner and one Deputy Commissioner, who, I submit, alone has the power to exercise the authority of the Commissioner of Corporations.

And it further provided for the employment of special agents and other employees of different grades. And then, of course, it provided that the information and data—"such information and data," quoting from the act, as should be gathered by the diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the corporations which are described by that act—should be reported to the President so that he might be enabled to make recommendations to Congress, and that he might make public so much of such information as he should decide it wise to make public.

By the next clause the Commissioner was given powers of investigation. He was given, so far as they were applicable to his situation, the same broad powers which had been, by the Cullom Act, conferred for different purposes upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I need not refer to them.

He was especially given the right to subpœna and compel the attendance of witnesses. Congress doubtless judged that so great a power as that—the power to summon witnesses and put them under oath—could not, or at least ought not to, be conferred by anything except express language, conferring such powers.

Let us see for a moment the reason for that. In the study of the operations of corporations the Commissioner was given authority first to gather information and data, words in no way appropriate for a description of testimony to be obtained from any person. He might obtain that information from articles in a magazine. He might obtain the data from statistics published by the Government of the nation, or of the various States or of cities and towns. He might obtain the information and data from the returns of corporations made to the various States or cities and towns in which they conduct their business. He might obtain the information or data from any source. It, however, might happen that he would wish to obtain information and data, in the broad sense, from some persons who were engaged in the management of corporations, and so he was given the power to subpœna those persons and put them upon their oath. Mark it, if your honor please, that his study was the study of the lawful operations of corporations. It might be, however—though his purpose would not carry him to the investigation of any offenses against the law—that in conducting this inquiry he might reach some person who had been concerned in the guilty transactions, the unlawful transaction of corporations, and the power was given him then, under the conditions named in the act, to obtain their testimony and evidence at the price of the immunity which the Constitution requires as a substitute for its own safeguards. This was foreseen, and therefore the last sentence of that clause of section 6 to which I am now referring was added. It is in these words:

"All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said 'Act to regulate commerce' and by 'An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission,' etc., approved February 11, 1893, supplemental to said 'Act to regulate commerce,' shall also apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence in pursuance of the authority conferred by this section."

Why was this last section added? Have we received an explanation or elucidation of it from our distinguished friends upon the other side of this cause? I have listened carefully and waited patiently for such an explanation. It had some purpose. It is a cardinal principle of interpretation that no part of the law should be disregarded to which a court can attach a meaning. No court has the right to say that that enactment of Congress is without meaning or without force, and I submit that no one has a right to interpret that act to mean anything different from what it says. I say to your honor that its purpose and effect was this: To create a restriction upon the capacity of the Bureau of Corporations to impose requirements, obligations, or liabilities upon the citizen, on the one hand, or to confer upon the citizen, on the other hand, any immunity, unless a great significant act had been performed by the Commissioner, selecting out of the body of the citizenship those persons upon whom obligations and requirements and liabilities might be imposed, or to whom, on the other hand, immunity might be granted.

There is no cause for me to find a reason for this enactment. It is enough that it is there, that it is the law, that it is plain, that it is binding upon us all. As the lawmaking body, Congress has a right to make laws that shall be binding upon us all. But it was added for a purpose. It was added, as I have said, for the protection alike of the citizen and of the Government, and the reason is not far to see. It lies right in the difference in the constitution of the two bodies whose powers and functions I have attempted to lay before your honor. The Interstate Commerce Commission is limited in number. No one pretends that any one of the Commissioners can delegate any one of his powers, or that the Commission all together can delegate any of its powers. It sits under the superficial appearance of a court and decides questions. Witnesses are called before it in an orderly manner, and they testify in the face of the world. On the other hand, the Bureau of Corporations has no semblance of a court. It decides nothing, it orders nothing. It contemplates, it gathers information, it studies that information in behalf of the Government, and it submits the result to the President of the United States, and none of these things does it do under the ordinary forms of judicial procedure.

Mr. Miller's rather extraordinary claim the other day shows the reason of this provision and shows how wise Congress was, foreseeing the condition which would necessarily arise, in providing against it. Mr. Miller said the other day he was not quite willing to claim that the Commissioner of Corporations could multiply himself indefinitely, but he said that wherever the Commissioner of Corporations put any man in charge of a particular part of the operations of his Bureau, that person had the power to do all that Garfield himself could do. When I saw the full force of that contention I exclaimed that it was intolerable that an unlimited number of men could go about the country and by their mere asking of questions of the citizen put him under an obligation to answer, for the refusal of which he could be indicted and punished according to law. It is equally intolerable that an unlimited number of men could go about the country with the authority of the Commissioner of Corporations, scattering acts of grace in their pathway. Congress, foreseeing that the Commissioner would have to exercise his functions by the employment of many subordinate agents, provided against any such results as those that I have described by the enactment of this provision.

Let us take it first from the point of view of the citizen. This sentence says, among other things, that all the liabilities imposed by the act of February, 1893, shall be imposed upon persons who may be subpœnaed to testify. Can that word "subpœna" be read out of the act as useless and meaningless and unnecessary? Suppose Mr. Robertson had asked of some person a question relevant to the investigation, and that person declined to answer. Suppose that person had been presented to a grand jury under the act of 1893—because the liability to indictment under that act is the only liability which my friend Rosenthal the other day said was imposed by this sentence of the clause in question. Suppose, for instance, that Mr. Robertson had, upon the letter of authority from Mr. Garfield, asked Mr. Cudahy to answer some questions that were relevant to the investigation and he had declined, and he was presented by a grand jury. What would become of an indictment which omitted the allegation that the person who had refused to answer had been subpœnaed? Suppose we had such an indictment here. Suppose Mr. Cudahy were here and had demurred to the indictment, which failed to allege that he had been subpœnaed, but merely alleged that Robertson being duly authorized by the Commissioner of Corporations had asked him a relevant question, and that he had refused to answer it. Suppose my friend Rosenthal were here arguing that demurrer, what would he say? He would say that by the act which created this Bureau and gave it the right to acquire information in any way it was provided in express terms that the liability to indictment was imposed only upon those persons who were subpœnaed to give testimony.

Can anyone answer that argument of my Brother Rosenthal? Is there a lawyer great enough living to-day or has there ever been a lawyer skilled enough in the criminal law to answer that argument and induce your honor to overrule that demurrer and put that citizen upon his trial? No. He is not liable to indictment, because the law expressly says that he shall not be liable to indictment until he has been subpœnaed.

Now, if it be true that the issuing of a subpœna is an indispensable prerequisite to the imposition of the liability to indictment of a citizen upon the ground that that liability by the very words of the act is imposed upon him only when he is subpœnaed, by what process of reasoning can it be denied that the immunity, the word which immediately follows liability, is conferred only upon those persons who are subpœnaed in pursuance of the law? My friend, seeing the force of that contention the other day, said that this act might be considered in one way for one purpose and in another way for another purpose. Not so, your honor. I challenge him or any other man to bring any case here, where a court has taken up the same identical statute and construed it in one way for one purpose and in another way for another purpose. The controlling reason why it should be construed in the manner which I present to your honor is, that if it should be construed in any other way it would be an invasion of the liberty of the citizen and a disregard of his rights, such as has never been shown by any legislative body from the beginning of the Government to this day.

So therefore while I have stated in the discussion of the Cullom Act that the subpœna there may not be an indispensable prerequisite to the obtaining of immunity, provided only the witness testifies in accordance with the provisions of that act, I say here that the subpœna provided for in section 6 is an indispensable prerequisite, an indispensable condition, either to the imposing of the liability to indictment or the conferring of the opportunity for immunity. I say that there is no other possible interpretation of that clause of the act. I say that it was a reasonable clause to put in there in view of the character of the Bureau of Corporations and the necessity of conducting its investigations through numerous agents and not, as before the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the semblance of judicial forms, and that if Congress had omitted that provision it would have been regardless of the first rights of the citizen.

An argument was made the other day that that claim of the construction of that part of section 6 led to the absurd consequence that a person gained immunity merely because he was subpœnaed. Oh, no; oh, no. You might as well say that that construction—which is the construction that your honor would have to adopt in case of an indictment—included the propostion that a man was indicted as soon as he has been subpœnaed. The fair meaning of that sentence is that if he is subpœnaed and then refuses to answer a relevant question he is liable to be indicted. If he is subpœnaed and answers a relevant question to an offense which he has committed or which he may have committed, he is entitled to the immunity. If he is subpœnaed there is the chance of an indictment or the chance of an immunity, according to the way in which he shall determine his conduct. I have no words at my command which will make any more clear to your honor my opinion of the reason of that provision in the law and the effect of that provision.

The claim that it is material to consider whether Mr. Garfield delivered any of the information to the Department of Justice I do not understand to have been referred to to any great extent. I can not understand that claim.

The COURT. Some reference was made to it in one or two arguments.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. On this line?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. That not only the act of commerce and labor and the Cullom Act were involved here, but also the appropriation act of 1903, and that the immunity clause under each should have consideration because the investigation Garfield was making was under the Sherman Act and the appropriation act referred to the Sherman Act—no, because the indictment was under the Sherman Act, and that Garfield, from his investigation, furnished facts for the indictment.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. I believe that I have stated it correctly, as gleaned from the arguments.

Mr. MOODY. I will then discuss it from that point of view, your honor.

Mr. HYNES. And for the prosecution.

Mr. MOODY. I will then discuss it from that point of view.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. We did not limit our argument with reference to the act of 1903 on that sole proposition.

The COURT. No.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Not at all.

The COURT. Mr. Rosenthal took the ground that the immunity clause of the appropriation act was an independent clause; that it was an independent act for any purpose to which it was applied.

Mr. MOODY. In that I will agree with him.

The COURT. Very well.

Mr. MOODY. I will say now that I think that is true, and I will discuss it upon that assumption. In the first place, very briefly let me consider the claim that the delivery of any evidence to the Department of Justice is in any way material in this case upon grounds independent of the act of 1893. Of course the immunity was conferred or not conferred when this information was obtained. If it was obtained under such circumstances as gave to these defendants immunity under the law, certainly that immunity could not be taken away from them because the information was not delivered to the Department of Justice, as that, under the guise of a ruling of law, would reverse the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Counselman case.

On the other hand, if it was obtained in such manner as not to confer immunity at the time it was obtained, obviously no subsequent use of it could be retroactive and have the effect of giving it——

The COURT. I think we are all perhaps at one point on that.

Mr. MOODY. That is all I intend to say, because I think——

Mr. HYNES. The supreme court of Maryland, your honor, has decided that evidence given for one purpose, even with the consent of the party, if directed to another purpose afterwards may be availed of by the party, and the objection, the constitutional objection, may be accurate at that time.

The COURT. When that was first urged I understood it to be urged—I think perhaps it was urged—on the ground that that would be necessary in order to entitle the defendants to immunity given in the appropriation act?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. It is now agreed by counsel on both sides that whatever that act says it says independently of any particular act.

Mr. MOODY. It is the general law.

The COURT. It is the general law.

Mr. MOODY. And I will come to that any moment.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. So I think I may safely leave the proposition of the materiality of the delivery of any evidence to the Department of Justice to what I have already said about it.

The COURT. Anyway, General Moody, upon what argument do you base your statement that the duty of the Commissioner of Corporations looked only to the study of the lawful operations of the law? Might not Congress have intended and does not this act show that Congress did intend to discover through this Department evasions of the law, violations of the law, whether a creature of the law was living above the law, outside of the law, and if that be so might Congress not have had in mind the notion of punishing anybody who was not entitled to immunity by reason of the investigation?

Mr. MOODY. I will answer your honor's question as I understand it. I base my conclusion that the purpose of the creation of the Bureau of Corporations was the study of the lawful operations of corporations, and that any investigation of unlawful conditions would be incidental, upon a study of the act creating that Bureau and a comparison of its provisions with the law relating to the Department of Justice, which was passed, I believe, thirteen or fourteen days afterwards, and was being considered by Congress at the same time. Of course there can be no demonstration about it. Congress has not limited the Bureau of Corporations to a study of the lawful operations of corporations; it has not limited the Department of Justice to the study of unlawful operations of corporations, but——

The COURT. Well, doesn't the decision of the Hale case, if it be accepted that the corporation is not immune, can not be immune—if that is the effect of the Hale case, did not Congress have the double purpose?

Mr. MOODY. It is possible that they might have had the double purpose in view of that decision, but I think the primary purpose—I think it appears fairly from this act that the primary purpose was the study of the lawful operations of corporations, with the view of solving, among other questions, those which I presented to your honor as appropriate for the study of that Bureau. Now, I can say very briefly all that I have to say upon that, and that is this: The Commissioner is directed to make "diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation, joint stock company, or corporate combination engaged in 'foreign or interstate commerce,' and to gather such information and data as will enable the President of the United States to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce."

The purpose was to investigate the organization, conduct, and management of the corporations in order to furnish information and data to the President so that he could recommend remedial legislation to Congress.

The COURT. That is clearly the primary purpose.

Mr. MOODY. Yes; that is clearly the primary purpose.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. And that is perhaps all I would say. That there might be incidentally criminal conduct developed in the study of corporations I would not for a moment deny. But now, a few days afterwards, Congress had, as a primary purpose, the study of the unlawful operations of corporations. So in the act passed February 23, 1903, two things were done. First—or, rather, three things were done. First, the very unusual step was taken of appropriating $500,000 to be expended in the absolute discretion of the Attorney-General. It authorized the Attorney-General to employ special counsel and agents of the Department of Justice to conduct suits, proceedings, or prosecutions under the so-called "Sherman Act" and the so-called "Wilson Act," and for the purpose of showing that those prosecutions were intended to be earnest, for the first time, power to compel testimony was given. Up to that time, as Mr. Rosenthal pointed out very well, it was the Interstate Commerce Commission alone that had the power to compel testimony. So I say, and perhaps it is all that can be said, and your honor has expressed it, that the primary purpose of the Bureau of Corporations was to study the lawful operations of corporations, and only incidentally did that Bureau come to study any unlawful operations.

Mr. MILLER. How about the Martin resolution?

Mr. MOODY. The Martin resolution was broader than that. The Martin resolution, passed by one House of Congress, did specifically direct the Bureau of Corporations to inquire, in the words of that resolution—I don't remember them now—whether a combination existed which had affected prices.

The COURT. That made its duty imperative.

Mr. MOODY. I think it did. I think I must concede that it did. But I am studying now a proper construction of the statute from its own terms, and having no light upon it from any investigation that was ordered years afterwards.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. It is, however, said that the delivery of such evidence as has been obtained to the Department of Justice brought the transaction within the terms of the act of February 25, 1903, to which I have just referred. There are two or three answers to this. Each one of them, I submit, is conclusive.

First, the testimony taken by Garfield, or, to be more accurate, the information taken by Garfield was not and could not have been taken under the act of 1903, because that act extends the immunity only to a proceeding, suit, or prosecution under certain acts, of which the Sherman Act is one. Clearly, by any use of the words "prosecution" or "suit," Garfield's investigation did not come within those two terms.

The COURT. No; but what about this indictment?

Mr. MOODY. This indictment?

The COURT. This indictment is under the Sherman Act?

Mr. MOODY. Oh, yes; this is a prosecution under the Sherman Act—undoubtedly a prosecution under the Sherman Act; but the investigation proceeded. The investigation had nothing whatever to do with the prosecution; and it is not urged that Garfield had anything to do with the prosecution, and the other day in discussing this my friend Rosenthal said that he could not for a moment claim that Garfield had acted in a suit or a prosecution, but what he did claim was that Garfield's investigation was a proceeding, and therefore it might be under the act of 1903.

Mr. MILLER. Well, if Garfield, with the approval of the President, assisted the Department of Justice in getting evidence for use before a grand jury, or in the prosecution of the indictment, then I should contend, and I think that counsel for all the defendants contend, that that became a production of evidence within the act of February 25, 1903.

The COURT. It has been contended here that one of the objects of Garfield's investigation, as shown by the evidence, was to bring on the indictment.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. As it did.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. As it came on.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. That Garfield made the investigation for the purpose of helping the Department of Justice to so present the matter to the grand jury as to indict the defendants, and that that actually happened.

Mr. MOODY. Now, in the first place, I invite contradiction if I am mistaken in saying that Mr. Rosenthal the other day said that clearly Garfield's proceedings could not be considered as a suit or prosecution, but rested upon the broader word "proceeding."

Mr. ROSENTHAL. I think I rested it upon a proceeding. I don't think I argued the other at all.

Mr. MOODY. I thought you made a concession about it.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. No.

Mr. MOODY. It perhaps does not make very much difference whether you call Garfield's investigation a proceeding or a suit or a prosecution, because if this was a proceeding under the Sherman Act, if the investigation was a proceeding under the Sherman Act, it is not necessary for us to consider whether it is a suit or a prosecution.

The COURT. Oh, no.

Mr. MOODY. Because proceeding, which is a much broader word, is enough, and I will only say, with respect to that, that I have found nowhere any definition or use of the word "proceeding" which did not include the idea that it was a step taken in some judicial process. A very exhaustive brief has been presented to me upon that question, with which I will not trouble your honor, because I think very clearly that a proceeding is a step in a judicial process, and that only in the loose use of language can Garfield's investigation be said to be a proceeding.

Mr. MILLER. But a grand jury investigation is?

Mr. MOODY. A grand jury investigation is.

The COURT. I think it might be said here now, as well as at any time, that within my judgment the facts do not show that in the beginning of this investigation Garfield was helping anybody or intended to help anybody. What effect had the giving of the information to the Department of Justice, when he was directed to do so by his superiors, is the only question in this case.

Mr. MOODY. I shall come to that in a moment.

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. The next answer to this position is this: That the immunity act of 1903 is the same immunity act as that contained in the law of 1893. No one has pointed out any difference between the two acts.

The COURT. Just how does it read?

Mr. MOODY. In this way:

"Provided, That no person shall be prosecuted or be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in any proceeding, suit, or prosecution under said acts."

Now, if anybody can point out to me now any material difference between the act of 1893 and the act of 1903 I would be very glad if he would do it. I can not see that there is a difference in a word, and the Supreme Court has said that the two laws were in almost exactly the same words.

Mr. MILLER. It says nothing about subpœna.

Mr. MOODY. No.

The COURT. Neither does the act of 1893.

Mr. MOODY. Neither does the other act say anything about subpœna.

The COURT. Neither does the act of 1893.

Mr. MOODY. Neither one.

Mr. MILLER. And there is nothing about an oath; it says nothing about an oath.

Mr. MOODY. Neither does the act of 1893.

The COURT. None of the three of them say anything about it.

Mr. MOODY. No; none of the three of them say anything about it. They are all alike in that respect, but of course in a suit, proceeding, or prosecution information which is given is always testimony, it is always evidence, and the courts which are conducting suits and proceedings and prosecutions have the power to subpœna without its being expressly conferred upon them in any law. The only significance in the provision for subpœna in the Cullom Act was that it conferred upon the Commission the power which it would not have inherently, as the court has, to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documents; and its great importance there consists in the fact that it is at the very threshold of the immunity, at the exit of which lies the idea of prosecution for perjury, and that it characterizes the kind of information and statement out of which alone immunity can grow.

Mr. MILLER. In response to the Attorney-General's question about differences in the acts, I would like to suggest that under this act of February 25, 1903, it is very obvious—it being according to the entire terms of the act—that if a person should put into the hands of the United States attorney evidence which concerned the transaction, the criminal transaction, or one of these attorneys that are provided for there, special attorneys, to carry on those proceedings, that that would be the production of evidence within the immunity provision of that act.

The COURT. I understood you to argue that the use made of the information furnished in the Garfield report alone brought the case under that.

Mr. MILLER. Yes; I think so; but we did not rest our case on that by any means.

The COURT. No; but the Garfield report was used before the grand jury, and that the defendants furnished the parts of it which were used before the grand jury.

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

The COURT. Furnished it to Garfield?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

The COURT. And that Garfield furnished it to the Department of Justice.

Mr. MOODY. The whole case of the defendants is based upon the theory that they acted in obedience to the compulsion which was conferred upon Garfield by the act creating his office. Their whole case depends upon the theory that he was investigating by virtue of the provisions of his act, and not by virtue of the provisions of any other act. If he obtained this information under the provisions of his own act it is governed by the rules of law which surround and restrict that act. It can have no other effect, because subsequently it may have been diverted from its proper uses and devoted to the consideration of the grand jury. I do not care the snap of my finger whether it be considered that this testimony was taken under the act creating the Bureau of Corporations, or whether it be considered that any part of it was taken under the act of 1903, because in either case it was taken by Garfield and the investigation was made by Garfield, and every condition and restriction which bounded his powers must be considered to be operative, whether he acted under the one act or the other act.

Mr. HYNES. And that he was acting as an agent of the Department of Justice also.

Mr. MOODY. That he was acting as an agent of the Department of Justice also?

Mr. HYNES. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. Garfield has been put to a good many uses in this case, but the theory that he was an agent of the Department of Justice appears a little late. I hardly think that I will argue it. If one thing is clear in this case above all others, it is that what Garfield did, he did not as a private citizen employed by the Department of Justice, but as Chief of the Bureau of Corporations, under the powers the law creating that Bureau conferred upon him. I care not whether he acted under the law of 1903 or the law of his own creation, because the provisions for immunity in the law of 1893 are exactly the same—they are exactly the provisions of the immunity laws of 1903, and whether he acted under the one law or whether he acted under the other law he is subject to the further restriction that he could impose no liability, he could confer no immunity unless upon those persons who were subpœnaed by him.

It is precisely, if your honor please, as if Congress recognizing the great extent of the investigation by Garfield and the numerous agents that he might employ, and the danger that he could impose liabilities upon citizens or offer them immunities—impose liabilities all over the country and scatter immunities all over the country—it is precisely as if foreseeing that condition, instead of saying that that could be done only in the case of persons subpœnaed, had said he shall not impose the liability to indictment upon any citizen, he shall not confer the immunity which the law confers upon any citizen, until he first files his name with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Some way had got to be found to restrict both the liabilities which might be imposed by Garfield and his subordinates and the immunities which might be conferred by them, and the way actually selected was the natural way—to say that those obligations and requirements and liabilities should be imposed only upon, and those immunities should be conferred only upon, such citizens as he should select and serve with the process of subpœna. Your honor will therefore observe that the subpœna in the Bureau of Corporations act has a very different purpose and function from the subpœna which the Interstate Commerce Commission is entitled to issue.

I do not know what evidence it is claimed that Mr. Garfield did deliver to the Department of Justice. I only know what I have heard here. I have heard it said—and it is clearly true, of course—that Mr. Garfield handed to Mr. Pagin some tables showing, I think, the proportion of slaughtering between the different packing houses, and showing that those proportions had continued constant, and the claim might fairly be made that that could not come about by accident, that it must have been the result of design, that it must have been the result of the design that the business of the country should be unlawfully divided between these different concerns. I understand that that information was obtained from two sources, each confirmatory of the other. One was the books of these packers and the other was the records of the Bureau of Animal Industry. Whether it is claimed that any other evidence was delivered to the Department of Justice, I do not know. I suppose it to be true that the Garfield report, which was a public document and which was circulated all over the country, was available for the use of the district attorney. Whether he used it or not, I do not know.

It is said here in this case that the President wrote a letter which has some bearing upon this question. I would be the last man who would restrict counsel in the performance of their duty to their clients. If they felt it their duty to introduce that letter, written upon another subject, against the man in the White House, who is as helpless to come here and explain it as if he were a child who had not learned the letters of the alphabet—if they felt it to be their duty to make that attack upon a man who is powerless to meet it, then I have nothing to say. In a sense it was true that there was some assistance. Just as there poured in the complaints from the suffering people of this country to the Attorney-General they poured in, according to this evidence, upon the Chief of the Bureau of Corporations, and he has told your honor that by direction of the President he turned those names over to the Department of Justice for investigation. We take the responsibility for it and bear all the consequences that come from it.

Mr. MILLER. In justice, perhaps, to ourselves I should like to have the distinguished Attorney-General state how the introduction or the putting in evidence of the letter of the President, which was itself a public document, made so by the Attorney-General, constitute any attack upon the President of the United States?

Mr. MOODY. I leave what I have said without a word of qualification. It is claimed here, if your honor please, that Mr. Garfield waived the oath. It is not seriously claimed that this statute by its fair interpretation had regard to anything except sworn testimony and sworn evidence, but it is claimed that in some manner Garfield had waived the production of the oath, and therefore that which was not testimony could be regarded as such. I do not understand this claim. Garfield could waive nothing. The principle of waiver is as foreign to this discussion as the rule in Shelley's case or any other equally irrelevant principle of law. Garfield had the widest discretion, as my brother Miller has said here, as to the number of agents that he should employ, the number of persons from whom he should obtain information, the number of books which he should examine. But he could not by any act of his determine what persons should have the immunity granted to them by the terms of a statute. The statute gives immunity only in the case of testimonial compulsion by legal process to a witness who makes oath to his statement. Garfield has no right to vary that law by a hair's breadth. Suppose Congress had said, "be it enacted that if any witness is called and testifies upon oath, or gives sworn evidence relative to any offense with which he is charged, or may be charged, he shall have immunity." Would my friends contend that Mr. Garfield could waive the provisions of that act and say and do anything whatever that would bring a person within the immunity who by the terms of the law was outside of it? And yet, that act is in substance and effect what this immunity act is, and there is nobody in this argument who has disputed it. Mr. Garfield could no more extend the benefits of immunity, could no more admit a citizen to the benefits of immunity which was confined within clearly defined limits by Congress itself, than his chief, the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, could admit to this country an alien who is excluded by its laws. He could no more extend the benefits of immunity beyond the terms of the laws than the Postmaster-General could allow me or any other citizen to transport in the mails mail matter at any other than the compensation prescribed by law.

The question is not what Mr. Garfield did, but what these persons who are claiming immunity did. If they did the things which by the law they were bound to do in order to get immunity, then they have it. If they failed to do those things, then they have failed at their own peril, as the common-law witness who testified without making his claim of privilege testified at his own peril.

The authority, may it please your honor, of Government officials is confined rigidly within the law which creates their offices. They can no more travel out of the course marked out for them by the law-making body than a planet can escape from its orbit. They are unlike private agents, who may sometimes bind the principals, where their authority is not broad enough to do that thing. There have been presented to your honor very many cases showing the difference between Government officials and private agents. I shall not refer to them. I say that Mr. Garfield had no power to vary the extent of that law one hair's breadth or to bring any man within its benefits who was not brought within its benefits by the will of Congress itself. I dismiss almost with a word the claim that Mr. Garfield promised immunity. Whether there is any evidence of such a promise or not I do not know and I do not care.

Mr. MILLER. There is no claim of it.

Mr. MOODY. Then I was mistaken, and I will not even say that word.

Mr. HYNES. Except the statement that they were protected by the act.

Mr. MOODY. And that is a statement of his opinion of the law, and we have been arguing something over a week as to what the law means; so I do not think I will undertake to refute it.

The Supreme Court has held, if your honor please, in the Hale case, first, that corporations are not within the immunity act; and, second, which is the only thing I desire to dwell upon, that they are not entitled to the protection of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which that statute supplants. It follows that Mr. Garfield had a right to the inspection of all these books and documents which are said to have conferred immunity on these defendants.

The COURT. Now, that leads me to the question I would like you to consider. Do you regard it as one of the purposes of this act, conceding that the primary purpose was the legislative purpose, do you regard it as a secondary purpose of the act to get evidence of violations and evasions of the law to be used against the corporation; and if so, how far can the department, over which he presided, use the individuals who are connected with the corporations to furnish information against the corporation without giving immunity.

Mr. MOODY. Just as far, if your honor please, as those individuals chose to go. Just as at common law, the Government had a right to obtain any information which a person chose to disclose. If he chose to claim his privilege, he was exempt from the disclosure of anything that tended to incriminate him. If he should avail himself of the substitute for his privilege under the Constitution by following the pathway accurately marked out for him by the statute of immunity, he gets his immunity. If he does not choose to do that, he does not get his immunity, and he ought not to get his immunity.

The presumption is that men are honest. What do I care about the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and what does your honor care? Neither of us have anything that we wish to conceal. If we abandoned the path of rectitude, if we strayed beyond it, and began to violate the laws of the land, and we wished to get immunity from punishment for that violation, it is no hardship upon us that we should follow the pathway marked out by the statute; a pathway no more narrow, no more difficult to travel than the pathway marked out for the same evildoer by the Constitution of the United States.

I agree that if Mr. Garfield, in the manner provided by the law giving immunity, had obtained from any one of these defendants the books of the corporation, and those books contained anything relevant in the broadest sense to the offense with which they were charged, that would give them the immunity. I do not agree that the officers of these corporations, allowing him to do the thing which the law of the land gave him the right to do—to inspect their books—have obtained any special favor or immunity because they have allowed it. If they had warned the Government that they were misdoers, if they had warned the Government that it was traveling upon ground which they were privileged to hold sacred, then they would be entitled to all the privileges coming from the Constitution and to every immunity flowing from the immunity act which supplants the constitutional privilege. But they did none of these things.

Mr. HYNES. General, will you allow me——

Mr. MOODY. There has been nothing obtained from these defendants which, under the law of the land, to-morrow, without incriminating one of them, the authorities representing the Government of the United States could not obtain.

Mr. HYNES. May I ask this question, General? Does the learned Attorney-General forget that the very question that was put to them by Mr. Garfield was whether they were engaged in an unlawful combination or conspiracy, and that he announced to them that is what he was trying to find out?

Mr. MOODY. I do not forget it. I do not care. He put them on their guard. They were not entrapped into anything. There is no question of a net being set for them. I welcome the suggestion which my learned friend has given me. It takes out of this case any lack of general equity. Because they were given warning, on the very threshold of the investigation, that it might extend into the criminal field. Had the Government not done its duty? Was it not their duty, then, to see, if they claimed immunity, that they took steps to get it? Why, my friend has reminded me that the Government did more than it was required to do to supplant the common-law privilege. The common-law witness who was put upon the stand was asked the question which might incriminate him. No warning was given. Ignorant or learned, advised or unadvised, he was bound to claim his privilege at his peril. The Government did more than that. It acted as if it had said to the witness on the stand, "You are about to be asked questions which may relate to an offense with which you are charged." You have been advised by counsel better than whom the land can not afford. Hasn't the Government done its duty? If the defendants then did not seek the shelter of immunity, if they did not then seek the shelter that no honest, law-abiding citizen ever requires, the fault is their own, the peril is their own, and the consequences may fall upon their own heads.

Now, if your honor please, I have discussed this case in a manner such as my feeble powers would permit me. I have spoken with deep earnestness. I have spoken under a sense of profound responsibility to your honor, as well as to the people of this country. My judgment of the law, my opinion, is not important to your honor. It is important to me that I should say to your honr that I have given it, in all parts of this case, as it lies in my own mind. It is our claim that by the common law, crystallized into the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, the citizen, when he became a witness, was privileged not to answer any question which might incriminate him. He was protected against testimonial compulsion, compulsion to testify as a witness.

The Congress has supplanted that constitutional privilege by a substitute, and it is our claim that, though in some respects that substitute is broader than the privilege, in the vital respect that it pertains to the citizen when he becomes a witness upon the stand and under his oath, it is the same. And that no one under the laws of this land can obtain immunity unless he brings himself within the provisions of that statute. My distinguished friends can bring no decision and no dictum and no practice anywhere, from one end of this land to the other, in support of their contention. In support of ours we bring the decision of the highest court of one of our States.

And we claim, further, that these defendants who gave this information were not only under the restrictions in obtaining the immunity that were written in the act of 1893—immunity limited to the testimonial field alone, bounded, as I said this morning, upon one side by the fence of subpœna and upon the other side by the fence of perjury—but also, owing to the peculiar constitution of the Bureau of Corporations, under the further limitation that immunity can be conferred, and the liabilities can be imposed only upon persons who have been served with the subpœna of the Commissioner of Corporations.

If I am right in either of these contentions, the Government is entitled to a verdict as a matter of law. I can not conceive how your honor can be in doubt upon these questions. Yet, if there should exist anywhere, upon any part of this case, the faintest shadow of a doubt in your honor's mind, I implore your honor to remember that an erroneous decision or ruling against any of these defendants may be corrected. Their rights can not be taken away from them except by the judgment of that exalted tribunal at Washington, in whose keeping the people believe that the rights of the Government and of the individual alike are safe. There this question can receive that long deliberation, that comparison of differing views, which is denied to this or any other court sitting as this court does for the trial of a case at bar. On the other hand, an erroneous decision upon this case against the Government is irretrievable. It is an irreparable misfortune. It disposes not only of this great case, but it will dispose of others as great. It was the consideration to which I now allude which persuaded the great judge who sat here in the Counselman case, against his own inclinations and tendencies, to rule upon that case so as to best promote its transmission to the Supreme Court of the United States. Think of the benefits that have flowed from that decision. That began this great social and economic movement which is in the mind and the hearts of the people to-day.

If, upon this case, resting fundamentally as it does upon the propositions that "subpœna" does not mean subpœna, that "witness" does not mean witness, that "testimony" does not mean testimony, that "evidence" does not mean evidence, or that in some mysterious way, by some occult power never before recognized by the law of the land, some one has warped or distorted those words from the meaning which belongs to them; if, I say, upon this case, resting upon those propositions, these defendants escape the inquiry into the truth of the charges made against them, it will be a calamity to the Government, to the people, to the laws, to the administration of the laws, and, above all, to these defendants themselves. Above all, to these defendants themselves. In season and out of season, publicly and privately, I have claimed for them and urged for them the presumption of innocence which is their right. I recognize as well as any man the great and enduring service which the genius they and their forbears brought to the organization of this great business has done to the people of this country; benefits that can not be exaggerated, that ought not to be forgotten. No one is more ready to concede those things than I am. But they are charged with a violation of the laws of the land; and if they escape the inquiry into the truth of that charge the calamity to them will be greater than it is to any other living men. It is better not only that they should be tried and acquitted, but that they should be tried, convicted, and suffer the penalties of the law than that they should escape; than that they should be dismissed and go hence without day, upon pretenses so flimsey as those by which they seek deliverance at your honor's hands.

It is a question of law, your honor. According as you rule, one way or the other, this case must go. You, alone of all the judges of the land, of all the 80,000,000 of our people, have the solution of this question; and I leave it, with confidence, in your honor's hands.

The constitutional provision and the principal parts of the statutes relating to immunity under discussion in this case.

THE FIFTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

No person * * * shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.

PART OF SECTION 12 OF THE INTERSTATE-COMMERCE ACT.

SEC. 12. (As amended March 2, 1889, and February 10, 1891.) That the Commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of the business of all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted, and shall have the right to obtain from such common carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the Commission to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created; and the Commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this act; and, upon the request of the Commission, it shall be the duty of any district attorney of the United States to whom the Commission may apply to institute in the proper court and to prosecute under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States all necessary proceedings for the enforcement of the provisions of this act and for the punishment of all violations thereof, and the costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States; and for the purposes of this act the Commission shall have power to require, by subpœna, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

Such attendance of witnesses, and the production of such documentary evidence, may be required from any place in the United States, at any designated place of hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpœna the Commission, or any party to a proceeding before the Commission, may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, issue an order requiring such common carrier or other person to appear before said Commission (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying; but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

The testimony of any witness may be taken, at the instance of a party in any proceeding or investigation depending before the Commission, by deposition, at any time after a cause or proceeding is at issue on petition and answer. The Commission may also order testimony to be taken by deposition in any proceeding or investigation pending before it at any stage of such proceeding or investigation. Such depositions may be taken before any judge of any court of the United States, or any commissioner of a circuit, or any clerk of a district or circuit court, or any chancellor, justice, or judge of a supreme or superior court, mayor or chief magistrate of a city, judge of a county court or court of common pleas of any of the United States, or any notary public, not being of counsel or attorney to either of the parties, nor interested in the event of the proceeding or investigation. Reasonable notice must first be given in writing by the party, or his attorney, proposing to take such deposition to the opposite party, or his attorney of record, as either may be nearest, which notice shall state the name of the witness and the time and place of the taking of his deposition. Any person may be compelled to appear and depose, and to produce documentary evidence, in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify and produce documentary evidence before the Commission as hereinbefore provided.

ACT OF FEBRUARY 11, 1893.

An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission and in cases or proceedings under or connected with an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and amendments thereto.

Be it enacted, etc., That no person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents before the Interstate Commerce Commission, or in obedience to the subpœna of the Commission, whether such subpœna be signed or issued by one or more Commissioners, or in any cause or proceeding, criminal or otherwise, based upon or growing out of any alleged violation of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, or of any amendment thereof on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said Commission, or in obedience to its subpœna, or the subpœna of either of them, or in any such case or proceeding: Provided, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

Any person who shall neglect or refuse to attend and testify, or to answer any lawful inquiry, or to produce books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents, if in his power to do so, in obedience to the subpœna or lawful requirement of the Commission shall be guilty of an offense and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by fine not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Public No. 54, approved February 11, 1893.

SECTION 6 OF THE ACT ESTABLISHING THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR.

[32 Stat., 825, 827.]

An act to establish the Department of Commerce and Labor.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 6. That there shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be called the Bureau of Corporations, and a Commissioner of Corporations who shall be the head of said Bureau, to be appointed by the President, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. There shall also be in said Bureau a Deputy Commissioner, who shall receive a salary of $3,500 per annum, and who shall in the absence of the Commissioner act as, and perform the duties of, the Commissioner of Corporations, and who shall also perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or by the said Commissioner. There shall also be in the said Bureau a chief clerk and such special agents, clerks, and other employees as may be authorized by law.

The said Commissioner shall have power and authority to make, under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation, joint stock company, or corporate combination engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations excepting common carriers subject to "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and to gather such information and data as will enable the President of the United States to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce, and to report such data to the President from time to time as he shall require; and the information so obtained, or so much thereof as the President may direct, shall be made public.

In order to accomplish the purposes declared in the foregoing part of this section, the said Commissioner shall have and exercise the same power and authority in respect to corporations, joint stock companies, and combinations subject to the provisions hereof as is conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission in said "Act to regulate commerce" and the amendments thereto in respect to common carriers so far as the same may be applicable, including the right to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence and to administer oaths. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said "Act to regulate commerce" and by "An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission," and so forth, approved February 11, 1893, supplemental to said "Act to regulate commerce," shall also apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence in pursuance of the authority conferred by this section.

ACT OF FEBRUARY 25, 1903.

[32 Stat., 854, 903.]

An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes.

* * * * * * *

That for the enforcement of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and of the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and sections 73, 74, 75, and 76 of the act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved August 27, 1894, the sum of $500,000, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not heretofore appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General in the employment of special counsel and agents of the Department of Justice to conduct proceedings, suits, and prosecutions under said acts in the courts of the United States: Provided, That no person shall be prosecuted or be subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, in any proceeding, suit, or prosecution under said acts: Provided further, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution or punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

Approved, February 14, 1903.

Opinion by Judge Humphrey, March 21, 1906.

Judge Humphrey said:

"Gentlemen, unless I should take the time to write out my views on these motions I am as well prepared to give them now orally as I will be later, and I do not feel like causing the delay necessary to a written opinion.

"A number of acts of Congress are involved and have been discussed upon the arguments on the motion and cross motion to direct a verdict: The Cullom Act, the original interstate-commerce act, passed in 1887, and the acts with regard to testimony, supplemental thereto, in 1893; the act of February, 1893, establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor, and by its terms adopting certain portions of the first two named acts; the Sherman Act of 1890, and the appropriation act of February 25, 1903.

"The discussion has been so elaborate, and has been conducted with such ability and research, and so leisurely, I may say, in its presentation, that the court has been able practically to keep up each day with the review of such authorities quoted as the court regarded of such importance as to require a review. And I want to thank counsel, and I can do them no higher compliment than to say that so far as my research has gone the profession has furnished nothing in addition to what counsel have presented.

"The defendants are indicted under the Sherman Act, the antitrust act, charged with a conspiracy in restraint of trade. They have pleaded that as to them that act is suspended and inoperative and does not exist, because they were compelled to furnish evidence of and concerning matters contained in the indictment, and that under the law such furnishing of evidence gives them immunity.

"There is a provision in the commerce and labor act providing for immunity, and refers for the immunity to the Cullom Act and the act supplemental thereto.

"The commerce and labor act reads:

"'That all the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said' Cullom Act—I read in instead of a long description of the act—'and by said supplemental act shall also apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence in pursuance of the authority conferred by this section.'

"The act supplemental to the Cullom Act contains an immunity clause in the following words:

"'But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before said Commission or in obedience to its subpœna or the subpœna of either of them, or in any such case or proceeding.'

"And the act of February 25, 1903, contains an immunity clause slightly more liberal than either of these.

"The law under consideration, for the construction of which the court is called upon here is the commerce and labor act, adopting as it does certain portions of the other two.

"It is necessary to look into the purposes of Congress in passing that act in order that the court may determine what construction will best carry out the legislative intent, because it is the duty of the court in construing an act of Congress to give it such construction as will carry out the legislative purpose expressed in the act itself. It is clear to my mind that the primary purpose of the commerce and labor act was to enable Congress, through the channels of the officers charged with the execution of that law, to pass remedial legislation. It may have had a secondary purpose. I regard this as the primary purpose, the chief purpose, the legislative purpose. It is clear from the act itself that if there be a secondary purpose, the primary purpose, the legislative purpose was vastly more important in the mind of Congress than any other. Congress wanted to know how the laws were operating, laws with regard to corporations, how they were being evaded, how to strengthen them in case they needed strengthening, and what further legislation was necessary. In my judgment the purpose of every one of these laws, the high aim of Congress in passing each one of these laws, was a determined purpose that the creature of the law should not be allowed to grow beyond the law.

"This last effort, this commerce and labor act, is the repeated attempt of Congress to bring to its aid such information as would enable it to do whatever might be necessary for the control of artificial bodies created by law.

"Perhaps a secondary purpose was the punishment of offenders. It is perfectly clear to my mind that that was not the main purpose, because there were abundant laws already on the statute books for that, and a great department skilled in the work of punishing offenders. And still I am not able to say but what a primary purpose of the commerce and labor act might have been the punishment of offenders. I say this because it is not inconsistent with the act or with the other purpose that that should be so, so far as the corporation itself is concerned, as is made pretty clear to my mind by the late decision in the Hale case.

"If the statute is to be so construed as to carry out the legislative purpose, the legislative intent, how can that best be done? The statute itself surrounds the Commissioner with no forms, puts no legislative limits upon his methods, gives him unusual latitude as to methods. It does not require public hearings. I am of opinion that the act contemplated that he should proceed by private hearings, because it provides in express terms that the President shall decide how much of his investigation shall become public. If the Commissioner should have public hearings, the President would never have a chance to do the part, to perform the work, which the act assigns to him. I therefore conclude that the legislative mind intended that the Commissioner should proceed by private hearings.

"The act is a substitute for one of the most cherished rights of the American citizen, the right to remain silent when questioned upon any subject when the answer would incriminate him. It is conceded in argument that the privilege given by this amendment could not be taken from the citizen without giving him something equally broad and equally valuable. Congress had had the experience of having tried that. It had passed an act intended to take away the privilege and substitute an equivalent, and the Supreme Court had decided that the substituted thing was not an equivalent. I say it is conceded that in furnishing a substitute for this great right of the citizen Congress must give something as broad. It might be broader, but it could not be narrower. In my judgment the immunity law is broader than the privilege given by the fifth amendment, for which the act was intended as a substitute. The privilege of the amendment permits a refusal to answer. The act wipes out the offense about which the witness might have refused to answer. The privilege permits a refusal only as to incriminating evidence. The act gives immunity for evidence of or concerning the matter covered by the indictment, and the evidence need not be self-incriminating. The privilege must be personally claimed by the witness at the time. The immunity flows to the witness by action of law and without any claim on his part.

"I am of opinion that under this act when the Commissioner of Corporations, who has power to compel, makes his demand, it is the duty of the witness to obey. The act calls upon the citizen to answer any legal requirement of the Commissioner. The citizen may be punished for a refusal to answer such legal requirement.

"Contention has been made here that in order to get immunity the citizen should wait until the compulsion becomes irresistible. That is the effect of it. I am not able to bring my mind to accept that doctrine. If I am right in saying that immunity flows from the law without any claim on the part of the defendant, and at different times that has been conceded here in argument, then no act of any kind on his part which amounts to setting up the claim of immunity is demanded by the law. The law never puts a premium on contumacy. A person does not become a favored citizen by resistance to a legal requirement. On the contrary, the policy of the law favors the willing giving of evidence whenever an officer entitled to make a demand makes it upon a citizen who has no right to refuse. And it would be absurd and un-American to favor the citizen who resists and places obstacles in the way of the Government, as against the citizen who, with a full knowledge of the law, obeys without resistance the demand of an officer who has a legal right to make the demand for something which the citizen has no legal right to refuse.

"That brings us to this proposition, perhaps, that when an officer who has a legal right to make a demand makes such demand upon a citizen who has no legal right to refuse, and that citizen answers under such conditions, he answers under compulsion of the law.

"Is that the situation here? Was there compulsion in this case or were the defendants volunteers? There is so little dispute here about the facts that perhaps it is not necessary to discuss them at all. I am of opinion that the conference between Mr. Garfield, Mr. Krauthoff, Mr. McRoberts, and Mr. Dawes is the important event which fixes the character—the condition under which this evidence was given. There is some little dispute. It may be said that Mr. Garfield is an interested witness, as a representative of the Government. It may be said that Mr. McRoberts and Mr. Krauthoff, then being in the employ of the Armour Company and one of them being now a defendant, are interested witnesses; but there is little if any dispute, perhaps only on one subject, between Garfield and Dawes. It is only as to the fact that an oath was discussed. I believe they agree on every other proposition. Garfield says there was no discussion of the oath. Mr. Dawes agrees with Krauthoff and McRoberts that there was.

"I am not able to look at the evidence which was furnished in the case as being the voluntary production of these defendants.

"The character of such parts of it as I deem the most important is such that it absolutely dispels any thought of that kind from my mind. Reasoning naturally, reasoning upon the natural course which men in like condition would have taken, I am led to the conclusion that the defendants would have withheld that information if they could.

"It is contended that they were volunteers because they higgled with Garfield at times, debated, resisted, gave less than he asked, withheld some. The record does show that, but the fact remains that every approach was made by the Government. In no instance did the defendants go to Garfield offering anything. Garfield made his demands explicit, made them definite, and it does not, to my mind, destroy the character of compulsion under which they acted that the defendants, after having considered the law and after having made up their minds that they had no legal right to resist, still debated with the Commissioner in the hope of inducing him to minimize his demands and take something less than he had originally demanded. That in some instances was done.

"Garfield came to them; they did not go to him. He demanded in writing and through his accredited representatives, and I would not regard it as proper to hold him for any action of his representatives, the result of which did not flow straight to him through them from the defendants; but so far as such results did flow straight to him in answer to his demands, they were negotiations between him and the defendants on his legal demands, which they had no right to dispute or refuse to answer.

"He came to the defendants and presented them with the law. He held up before them his power as Commissioner. The defendants knew the law. They had been fully advised. They took further time after his first interview, and were advised further. They saw that the Martin resolution under the eighth section of the law made Garfield's duty imperative. After the passage of that resolution the defendants saw that Garfield was compelled to act, compelled to demand, and they were compelled to answer.

"I regard Garfield as having been under the strictest legal compulsion by the terms of the Martin resolution. Oh, but it may be said, he could have gone somewhere else and gotten his information. The record shows that he himself said that he could not; that he could not make the investigation imposed upon him as a legal duty by the Martin resolution and the eighth section of the law without getting it from these people. And the investigation does disclose that they are the authors of nearly one-half of all the business in their line in the whole country. So that, I think, he was compelled to demand from them as well as they were compelled to answer under this statute.

"Now, if the defendants volunteered nothing, but gave only what was demanded by an officer, who had the right to make the demand, and gave in good faith, under a sense of legal compulsion, I am of opinion that they were entitled to immunity under the act.

"But it is insisted by the Government that they did not give under compulsion because they did not give what is known in law as under testamentary compulsion—that they did not give under what is known in law as testamentary compulsion, and it is argued that testamentary compulsion means compulsion furnished by the subpœna and oath.

"I can add nothing to what has been adduced by way of argument here on those subjects. I am clearly of opinion that the best judgment to be had from all the authorities is that the subpœna is a useless and superficial thing after the parties are together.

"And I am also of opinion that under any one of these three acts in question—these three immunity laws in question—the production of books and papers would be legal evidence without the oath of any person where they are adduced as showing admissions against interest and against the party producing them.

"Upon authority in the Bramm and Boyd cases the oath is not essential, and upon reason this must be so. Books and documents prove themselves when produced for the purpose of showing admissions against interest. They are receivable as evidence in all courts against the parties producing them. The purpose of the oath was to secure the truth; that is always the purpose of the oath; that is the only purpose of the oath; and to be certain that we get the truth the court always starts out by putting the witness under oath. But the Garfield act, the act under which Garfield was clothed with power, did not require him to put anybody under oath. It required him to make investigation. He might make it according to legal forms or not. He might use any kind of evidence that he chose if it was suitable to his purpose. The evidence that he procured from these defendants, so far as it consisted of books and documents, was, however, legal evidence, and would be considered legal evidence in a court of law, and under any one of these acts the production of the books and papers was a complete compliance with the law providing for the production of evidence, documentary or otherwise.

"It is not strange that Garfield was satisfied not to swear the defendants, although he started out with that intention. He distinctly told them so, and his forms show that fact. He expected to put them on oath if he regarded it as necessary, if he had any doubt about the truthfulness of the evidence. He had access to the books of original entry. He was satisfied of that fact; his agents were satisfied of that fact. The record shows that over and over again by repeated answers, and there was not the slightest reason for putting anybody under oath so far as those books and documents were concerned, and the oath of no one would have made that evidence any stronger or any better than it is now without the oath.

"Now, gentlemen, I don't know that I can add anything to this brief discussion of this case that I have made thus orally. You may bring the jury, Mr. Bailiff.

"I ought to say, what I have omitted to say, and which you gentlemen may think I have passed over without considering it, that I regard the Hale case as settling the question of the liability of the corporation."

(The jury was here returned to jury box.)

The COURT. Gentlemen of the jury, under the law of this case the pleas, the immunity pleas, filed by the defendants will be sustained as to the individual defendants, the natural persons, and denied as to the corporations, the artificial persons, and your verdict will be in favor of the defendants as to the individuals and in favor of the Government as to the corporations.

The clerk will put the verdict in form, gentlemen. And before discharging you I wish to say that your services are none the less appreciated because of the fact that the case has gone off wholly upon questions of law. Perhaps it is no surprise to you, as you heard early in the consideration of the matter many discussions of that fact, from long delays taken by the court for the purpose of allowing counsel to make their pleadings in such a way as to have no occasion for the use of the jury.

I have further to thank you gentlemen for your patience, continued endurance of the necessary embarrassments which must come to a juror caught up and kept up for so long a time as you gentlemen have been during this trial. It is one of the burdens which comes to every citizen in any way clothed with public duties. He has to suffer some personal embarrassments.

I wish for your safe journeys to your homes and pleasant meetings with your families. You will now be discharged from further service in the case.

Mr. MORRISON. Before they are discharged perhaps we should make our exceptions.

The COURT. Before they are discharged?

Mr. MORRISON. I presume so.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Is it the form to have one juror sign the verdict?

The COURT. Oh, that is not at all necessary.

Mr. MORRISON. The Government excepts to that portion of the instruction directing a verdict on the issues as to the individual defendants, and requests the court to instruct the jury that the individual defendants are not entitled to immunity.

Mr. HYNES. And we for each and every of the defendant corporations——

The COURT. And the court, having considered the exception of counsel for the Government, overrules and denies the same, and declines to instruct the jury further.

Mr. MORRISON. Exception.

The COURT. And exception.

(To which ruling of the court, in so overruling and denying the motion of counsel for the Government, the Government then and there by its counsel duly excepted.)

The COURT. Now?

Mr. HYNES. And we, for each and every of the defendant corporations, your honor, move that the court instruct the jury to find the issues in favor of each and every of the defendant corporations.

Mr. BROWN. And we save an exception to the court overruling it.

Mr. HYNES. Yes; and we ask for that instruction now, your honor.

The COURT. And the court considers the exception taken on behalf of counsel for each and every of the defendant corporations, and overrules the same, and declines to instruct the jury further.

Mr. HYNES. Exception.

The COURT. Yes.

(Exception by counsel for the defendant corporations.)

The COURT. Gentlemen, you will be discharged from further service in the case.

Mr. MORRISON. Now, I assume that we make motions for appeal?

The COURT. Yes.

Mr. MORRISON. I assume we may take the necessary steps for appeal?

The COURT. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MORRISON. If we are entitled to it.

The COURT. I hope you will have, because it is a mighty important matter. I don't think I would have any right to find any other way, in view of my absolute settled judgment and decision, simply for the purpose of appeal.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] will take the chair temporarily, until the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] comes into the Hall.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16953, the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is only for a short time that I desire the attention of the House on the pending bill, carrying over $191,000,000 for the postal service. It has been very thoroughly and ably discussed in its details by the chairman of the committee [Mr. OVERSTREET]. It is not necessary for those who disagree with the majority of the committee on many of the questions involved in this bill to discuss any portion of the measure except the disagreeing items. It is impossible for the House of Representatives on an appropriation bill to give that relief by way of legislation to the country to which it is entitled owing to the existence of a rule of the House that prohibits legislation of a new character upon an appropriation bill. There are many questions that ought to be discussed fully and completely. It is impossible for them to be presented in debate to this House, except upon a general appropriation bill, although it may not be competent under the rules to legislate upon the identical question involved in debate, for the reason that separate bills upon those questions have not had or may not have a hearing before the committee as now organized.

One of the most important questions, in my judgment, for the consideration of this House is the question of railway mail pay. From year to year there is an increase in the pay demanded by the railroad companies of the United States for the transportation of mails. Gradually there is an increase in appropriations. It must be conceded that the growing business of the country and the population of the country contribute largely to this demand and its accession on the part of Congress to the railroad companies of the United States. But this committee has never had the information; it has not now the information; the Government of the United States has not the information, and no man within the sound of my voice has information upon which to act intelligently and pass an opinion as to what the proper and just pay ought to be to the railroad companies for the transportation of mails. I venture the assertion that there is not a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House or in the Senate who can come within $10,000,000 to-day from any proper basis of calculation as to what legitimately ought to be paid to the railroad companies of the United States for this service. Whatever information we get comes from the Department that supervises the execution of the statutory contract and whose official conduct is ever under review. It is, at best, a source of information that ought not to be entirely relied upon; but it is the only means, the only source of information, that we have, practically, except as we may draw legitimate inferences from those facts that are conceded.

Therefore this committee, instead of being able to present to the people of the United States an intelligent reason for the appropriation of $43,000,000 of money for the transportation of mails, are forced to present themselves to the House and to the country in the simple attitude of clerks recording the decree and the judgment of the Post-Office Department.

This question has been investigated, partially at least, by a commission, but no satisfactory conclusion was reached. The weight of the mail is ascertained quadrennially. The United States is divided into four sections, and the mail is weighed in each section once in four years, the weighing period covering about three months. An estimate for the whole period is made on this basis of calculation; the money is then paid at the rate fixed by the statute. That this is an unwise, inaccurate, unsatisfactory method all must concede. That it is open to fraud all must know.

I desire to present the views of the railroad companies upon this question and the views of those who oppose the continued payment of the large sums of money to the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails. We must consider and give just consideration to all conflicting statements of the interested parties and circumstances to determine the question, if we can, because we have no direct or positive disinterested evidence upon which we can legitimately and honestly reach a conclusion.

No direct contract is made by the Government of the United States with the railway companies. The work is performed under the statute, for the compensation that I have indicated.

Several presidents of the railway companies, in their examination before the Commission, stated that they received less pay for carrying the mails than they receive from the express companies, which pay them wheelage over the lines in the United States, and that the Government has a better contract, under the statute, with them than other persons for whom they carry similar matter or small articles of any character. On the other hand, it is contended that, although the express companies pay a large sum of money to the railway companies for wheelage, they can really carry the mails of the United States at less money than the railroads charge the Government of the United States and make a profit after paying the wheelage. If that is true, there is something wrong in the compensation.

It is said again that the railroad companies practice a fraud in obtaining the weights. I know nothing of that. We can not determine that question except from the meager testimony before us. It does appear in evidence before this committee that articles that were never intended for the mails, such as large tables, desks, safes, and articles of furniture, were carried in the mails of the United States. Whether the railroad companies weighed those articles or not it does not appear.

Mr. SIBLEY. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. I should like to ask if it is not true that the railroads weigh nothing under the law, that a representative of the railroad company is not even permitted to be present to check the weighing, it being done solely and alone by the representatives of the Government, without a representative of the railway being allowed to be present—that they are denied the right, even, to check the weighing?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am glad my friend made the suggestion. When I said the railway companies weighed it I did not mean that they furnished the force to do the weighing. We all understand that the United States Government furnishes the force that weighs the mail; but if these articles are there to be carried as mail matter, they are subject to be weighed, and ought to be weighed, and I assume that they are weighed. If they are not weighed, it is very clear that the Government of the United States is practicing a fraud upon the railroad companies which ought not to be tolerated. If this matter is weighed, it is equally clear that the railroad company is practicing a fraud upon the Government, and that ought not to be tolerated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I observed in the first place, the direct testimony is such that no intelligent body can form a proper judgment of what ought to be done. In the absence of satisfactory facts we must assume as truthful the deductions from facts that appear both for and against the railroad company in the consideration of the question. Then with an effort and a desire to give to the railroad companies and to the people exact and equal justice, if the circumstances and conditions surrounding railway mail transportation justify it, may we not insist on a trial test in the diminution of the rate of compensation?

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman a moment ago spoke of safes and tables and cases that were sent through the mails.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman inform the House who sent those, and how they got into the mails?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Those that I speak of, as shown in the hearing, appear to have been sent by the Treasury Department and the War Department of the United States Government.

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not know but it might be under the franks of Members of Congress.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I think Members of Congress are entirely free from that conduct.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the railroad companies under contract with the Government are compelled to take whatever is sent to them to be hauled or carried. They have no discretion about it. If the Government or the War Department, by order of the Secretary of War, sends anything to the railroad company they have got to take it, if it is in the ordinary mail coming from the Post-Office Department.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I doubt that very much, and for this reason: The law provides what matter is mailable. If a Department sends matter to the Post-Office Department that is not mailable, they ought not to accept it, but perhaps as a matter of courtesy between the Departments the law is overruled.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Take this as an illustration: Two years ago there were thousands of books sent out of here by a minister of the Gospel, a Mr. Crafts, under a certain frank, and it is understood that they did kick on that, but they had to take it. The contract between the Government and the railroad companies is made on the part of the Postmaster-General. If the gentleman will read that contract—and of course he has read many of them—he will agree that the railroads can not help themselves, that they must take what is sent to them by the Post-Office Department.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The statute of the United States makes the contract, not the Department. It simply engages the railroad to perform it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the shipment of these extraordinary articles, like safes, were made between the weighing periods, would it not result that the railroad companies were carrying them for nothing?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly; and would be an act of injustice on the railroad company.

Mr. STEENERSON. And they would be getting too much if they were shipped during the weighing periods?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. GOULDEN. What provision is being made to guard against a like abuse in reference to the shipping of these heavy articles?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. There is a proposed section in this bill that is intended to prevent that.

Mr. GOULDEN. Page 28, line 6, says:

That hereafter no article, package, or other matter shall be admitted to the mails under a penalty privilege unless such article, package, or other matter would be entitled to admission to the mails under laws requiring payment of postage.

Is that the clause that the gentleman refers to?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes. In my opinion the articles referred to as having been carried through the mail were not entitled to the privileges of the mail and are not now entitled to it; but this declaration on the part of Congress may, reasserted, protect the Department from that abuse.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in connection with what the gentleman from Georgia said. I understood him to say that a large number of books were shipped or mailed out of here by a man by the name of Crafts and that there was a kick about it. Who kicked—the Post-Office Department or the railroad company?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The Post-Office Department.

Mr. SIMS. The railroad company didn't kick.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, they had to take it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is clear, as I was about to observe when I was interrupted, that the Government of the United States through its Congress ought to take some active steps to remedy this matter. It has been over a quarter of a century since the law that provides for the compensation for carrying the mail was passed. The situation of things has changed materially. Transportation has gone down, it is said, in all lines, except United States mail. The Government ought not to permit itself to be imposed upon. Congress ought not longer to maintain on the statute book a law that will bring about this discrimination against the people. Make an amendment in line with the universal transportation reduction demanded by the public.

I refer to this, as I said in the beginning, not because we can legislate upon this bill at this time, but because it is a matter that arises in the consideration of the question before us and because, Mr. Chairman, of the existence of a rule in this House, the modification of which I think ought to be made promptly and about which I propose to speak for a moment later in this discussion.

Passing from this question of general railway mail pay of more than $43,000,000 proposed in the present bill as against $38,500,000 in the last one, I desire to call the attention of the House to the policy that has been invoked on the part of this House and sought to be continued as to certain items in the bill—the policy that in my judgment, or one of the policies embraced within the provisions of this act, is a very vicious one: It is granting the additional pay or compensation not provided in the general statute for railway mail pay; it is the granting of a gratuity or a subsidy, if gentlemen be not offended at that word, for alleged special facilities which in fact I believe do not materially exist.

Gentlemen rise on the floor in this House and demand special compensation to the railway company for that which they allege to be a special facility, resting their claim on the alleged benefits to a particular portion of a community in making the demand against the Federal Treasury. As a matter of principle it is wrong for the Government of the United States to permit its Treasury to be invaded to pay for a special privilege to particular individuals or sections. Surely this must be true if no general benefit can result to the whole people even indirectly.

Why should the particular railway company running from Kansas City, Mo., to Newton, Kans., and the railway company from the city of Washington to the city of New Orleans have privileges that no other railway companies in the United States have? Can any man give a legitimate reason for preferring these two roads—one a very short and insignificant one, and the other a long one, traversing a large portion of the country—as to why they should have certain privileges under this bill that the balance of the railway companies in the United States have not?

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. SIBLEY. Inasmuch as the gentleman asks if anyone will say—I think that through the northern sections of the country the railways traverse thickly settled populations, where the other business incident to the traffic compensates them for carrying the mails expeditiously. Through the South the railway that carries these fast mails traverses a sparsely settled district. It increases the time into New Orleans about fifteen hours, and into the State of Texas and the West about a day. It has been said by the gentleman's colleague from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] that six locomotives wait at Atlanta, Ga., for the arrival of this train, and in this way the South is given an expedited service. A road like the Southern could not carry under similar conditions with a road like the Lake Shore or the Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania has presented to the House a reason for his position upon this question. If the facts, as stated by him, were true, while his reason would not be a logical one, it might be a philanthropical one; but he is in utter ignorance of the facts, and therefore I excuse him for his untenable position. [Laughter.] The fact is that this railroad company does not make any better time than railway companies through the North, East, and West. It does not make as good time as a great many others. The fact that can not be disputed is that it runs through a section of the country that is as populous as the sections of the country traversed by nearly all of the roads in the other portions of the South and the West that do not receive a subsidy and through a more populous country than many of the northern roads traverse. My friend is mistaken in his facts.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Is it not a fact, and does not the gentleman admit it to be true, that if this Southern train that carries this fast mail was taken off there would be a delay in the mails from Chattanooga on to New Orleans of from twelve to fourteen hours?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I admit that the fact is now that there is a delay in three hundred and forty-eight days in the year of from fifteen minutes to fifteen hours on every one of these lines. That is the report to the Department.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But if you took off the train now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Take it off and there would not be a particle of difference, and I will demonstrate that fact later. Mr. Chairman, these subsidized roads do no more for the sections through which they run than do vast numbers of other roads that are not subsidized. They pass through a country that is as populous as that passed through by many of the roads that are not subsidized. They have to-day a practical monopoly, as far as possible for the Department to give, of the mails along those lines. This Southern Railway receives, not including its connecting lines, under the general contract with the Government of the United States, for carrying mails from Washington to New Orleans, $1,340,000. This would seem to be enough.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennesssee. I yield.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Tennessee is in error. It receives $1,340,000 for the line direct from Washington to New Orleans, without taking into account any branch lines.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is what I said.

Mr. FINLEY. I understood the gentleman to say including the branch lines.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I was proceeding to say, when the gentleman interrupted me, that this is aside from the pay of all its collateral lines. Let us look to the facts a moment before we get to the legal question that is involved in this proposition. The alleged reason, to begin with, was to have a close connection between New Orleans and New York, so that the morning train leaving New York could carry the mail to the South.

That was the argument of these gentlemen, to begin with, for the subsidy, but it so happens that the Pennsylvania division of this road from the city of Washington to the city of New York four or five years ago declined to ask for this subsidy any longer. I do not know the reason why it declined it. I have heard it stated, upon authority that I regarded as correct, that the road felt that its general pay for the carrying of mails was all the compensation to which it was entitled and did not demand it longer. If the prime cause for this subsidy demand was a fast mail from New York to New Orleans and the link in the line from New York to Washington is made ineffectual, not being under Government schedule, and trains are often delayed here at Washington, as is the case, on what ground, now, do they present their claim? They say, "We have put on an extra train—two cars for express and three for mail to New Orleans." That is true. That has been done, but this extra train when it reaches the city of Atlanta becomes a passenger train. Four passenger coaches are attached to it. But still this does not answer the question. The line between Washington and New York is not now subsidized and is not under United States control, and if its connections with the South are broken at Washington, how is New York mail especially expedited by the subsidy from Washington to New Orleans?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested a while ago that by reason of the want of business it was necessary to give extra subsidy to this line. Let me remind him that the business has grown immensely along this line and that the railroad company has, since the line was subsidized, placed on another train absolutely necessary to carry its passenger traffic. I do not believe that this road could afford or would for a moment decline to retain its present service if this subsidy was stricken out, but, gentlemen, I have been discussing merely collateral questions affecting the main issue. I do that because my distinguished friends from the South, my Democratic brethren who live along the line of this railroad company, are urging reasons of this sort. I do not like sectional Democracy or sectional Republicanism. I believe that this ought to be a National House of Representatives in its full significance.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOULDEN. I am one of those who voted against this subsidy in the last Congress.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I congratulate the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GOULDEN. But I am rather favorably inclined toward it now, for the proviso you inserted, I think, in the last session of the last Congress, says "that no part of this appropriation shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interests of the postal service."

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will explain that——

Mr. GOULDEN. With that proviso I should think that I would be rather justified in supporting it. I would like to know——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I said we ought to be national in our demands. What does the national Democratic party demand upon this question? It repudiates, it denounces, it condemns every character of subsidy. The Republican platform does likewise. Can you be heard to say to the people of the United States, standing upon your platform of opposition to a ship subsidy, that you are ready, because of a little paltry benefit to your immediate section, to violate the pledges of your party and the great tenets that it has held for a century? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the southern Democrats ought to appeal to their people and not appeal to this railroad company, and they will find virtue, at least, in the support of the great people of the South, as it is found elsewhere. [Applause.] Let me revert to the question of the gentleman from New York. He speaks of this as a "directory section," giving power to the Postmaster-General to expend it in his discretion. That has been a provision of this bill from the beginning. The Postmaster-General has said to you, as he says here in this report upon which I lay my hand now, and in the testimony of the Second Assistant before the committee, that he did not estimate for this subsidy as he estimated for the expenses of the Government. He says:

> We have not asked Congress to give it. We pay it out simply because when we have not asked for it, when there is no demand on the part of the Department for it, you still insist and pass the law. We regard your action under such circumstances mandatory and imperative upon us to obey and pay the subsidy.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to ask if it is included in the estimate of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. It is not included in the estimate of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. PAGE. May I interrupt my friend? On the contrary, is it not in the estimates of the Postmaster-General of these things that that will be saved from the former appropriation in his present recommendations to this Congress?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. So I understand. Let me read to the House just for a moment. After various questions to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General upon this question, I asked General Shallenberger this question:

> Mr. MOON. Then, General, let me come down to the very bottom question of administration: Do you want this money or not?
> General SHALLENBERGER. We are not asking it, nor expressing an opinion in reference to it.
> Mr. MOON. What is the reason that you all are silent on that question?
> General SHALLENBERGER. We are not silent.
> Mr. MOON. You say you do not ask it?
> General SHALLENBERGER. We do not estimate for it.
> Mr. MOON. And what is the reason you do not ask it?
> General SHALLENBERGER. Because we think that the effect upon the service at large is better if we do not select any particular route in any particular section for special favors.
> Mr. MOON. Then you do not select it because you think that it is a bad example, and that it affects the railway mail service elsewhere to give this subsidy?
> General SHALLENBERGER. That is the situation.
> Mr. MOON. That is the situation. So you think that for the good of the service the thing ought not to be done, taking the country at large?
> General SHALLENBERGER. Why, I think that for the good of the service at large it is better that no special favors be given to any one particular road or system.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does the gentleman from Tennessee find anything in that condemning this service when Congress authorizes it?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I find the policy on the part of the Government condemning it. I find that the Department recognizes it as a special favor, a special facility to a special road in a special section, that operates specially to the detriment of the rest of the United States. That ought to be enough for any Democrat to know.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Does the gentleman from Tennessee think that when the Government makes a contract for this service to be rendered, and then if the service was rendered, that it is a subsidy?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes. It was a subsidy contract. The gentleman simply, with all due respect for him, does not know what he is talking about. The Government of the United States has made a contract under statute with this very railroad company and the transportation of this identical mail, for which you are giving additional compensation to the extent of $196,000 a year upon a contract. I defy any intelligent lawyer upon this floor to deny the legal conclusion. When the Government of the United States by this solemn statute enacted that certain pay should be given for the transportation of certain mail it carried with it, by necessary implication in the contract and as a part of the law of the land entering into the contract, the obligation that the mail should be carried with reasonable haste and expedition.

If that be not so, you could carry the mail, under the statute, at any rate of speed. It is senseless to talk about the Government of the United States making a contract to carry slow mail. The law entering into every mail contract requires that reasonable haste and expedition be made; all necessary means and facilities for that haste and expedition constitute part of the contract. Additional compensation to induce the proper performance of a valid contract is not merely a subsidy, it is an iniquity.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, the gentleman from Tennessee says I do not know what I am talking about. That is all very well.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If that offends my friend, I will take it back, and I will state that he knows what he is talking about, but that I have not been able to explain to him what I mean.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And you never have been able to explain it. This matter has been up for years, and I have been uniformly in favor of it and you have uniformly opposed it, and I do understand what I am doing and what I am talking about, notwithstanding you say I do not.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will agree with you on that proposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is what you did say.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I said it; and if the gentleman will oblige me to do so, I will say it again.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am not taking any offense at it, because the gentleman has never been able to convince me yet that I was not right.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I never have been able, and do not expect to be able, to convince you, because——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do differ with the gentleman on the general meaning of subsidy. I know I differ with you. I think it is just as much an obligation devolving upon the Government when this proposition is made to give so many thousand dollars to a railroad for this service when it comes up to the requirements and renders it—I believe in carrying out the contract in full, and the spirit and letter of the obligation is to pay that amount. Do you know how much money the railroad loses or will be taken from them annually for failing to make connection?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. My objection is to making the subsidy contract. I know the service which you demand. You say it is a benefit to the country. I say it is not, simply for this reason—I am returning to the original proposition of benefits—for the simple reason if it made the connections from Washington to New Orleans every day on the main line, and then on the lateral lines which it owns fails to make connections so as to carry the mails into the interior of Tennessee and Texas, it would be utterly worthless, and the report of service says it is.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I believe I am right in stating that the Tennessee legislature indorsed what the gentleman says is a subsidy.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I just asked you that question.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee (continuing). That the Tennessee legislature did indorse this proposition some years ago, that many of the circuit judges and chancellors of the State indorsed it, that members of the county courts, lawyers, and members of the executive committee indorsed it; but they did so without knowledge of the truth. I knew that the power behind was the corporation that attempts to plunder the public Treasury [loud applause], and I disobeyed that instruction. [Renewed applause.] My constituents have sustained me.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am perfectly surprised at the charge the gentleman makes against the Tennessee general assembly.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman does not understand me to make a charge against the members of the general assembly of Tennessee; but the members of that assembly, like the members of the general assembly of Alabama, are often ignorant of the facts, and most generally of law. [Great laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I oppose, therefore, this provision, because of the detrimental effect it has upon the public service, because their compensation, the amount given, is specified by operation of law, and if it were not, I would object, because it is demoralizing to the Department of the United States Post-Office, and last, but not least, utterly demoralizing to the Democrats of some of the Southern States. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me right there, I understood the gentleman from Alabama to say that the Department makes no recommendation against this item.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I did not say that. I asked the gentleman from Tennessee if he could find anything there in what he read condemning it.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, I will read from the last report of the Postmaster-General, on page 9, in which he uses this language, which is a direct recommendation against it:

Curtailment has been recommended wherever possible, and many decreases are shown, of which the following are examples: Railway transportation, special facilities, $167,728.75.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That simply says that railroad expenses have been decreased.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Exactly the item which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is now discussing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not read that in that way.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama does not read anything in any way except subsidy for the Southern Railway fast mail.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is not just. You ought not to say that, because I believe, just as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If you will just take your seat for a moment, I will put you right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You put that reflection on me. I am not going to get offended. There is not the slightest danger of that; but I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated the situation clearly when he says the dense population of the Northern and Eastern States does not require this special service while the situation in the South is very different.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. But the facts do not sustain either the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the gentleman from Alabama on that proposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I concede to my distinguished friend and neighbor from Alabama, of course, honesty of purpose and good intention in this matter, as I do to all my other friends over here who differ with me about that. If I did not do that, I would do it as a matter of parliamentary courtesy if nothing else; but I do feel that these gentlemen really think they are getting special benefits, and that they are justified in it. I think it is wrong to take these benefits in this way from the Federal Treasury. There is the cardinal difference between us. They feel that they ought to vote for it because it is a benefit to them. I feel that I ought to vote against it, because I know that it is plundering the Treasury of my country. [Applause.]

But this is an unpleasant question for me to discuss with my neighbors, Mr. Chairman. Frequently it has occurred on the floor, and for two or three days they have not seemed as happy in my presence as before. [Laughter.] Therefore I will pass from the consideration of this question and present briefly one or two other questions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before the gentleman leaves that question I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has the gentleman from Tennessee examined the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General when these special privileges were first afforded, in 1885 to 1891?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Not recently. I should be glad to have the gentleman call my attention to anything.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to call attention to the fact that in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General submitted to Congress in December, 1890, he said that if these special appropriations for special facilities were provided for two or three years, the increase in the mail would be so great that the regular pay would equal both the subsidy and regular pay before, and then the subsidy could be withdrawn. That was in 1890; and I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that the regular pay of the Southern Railroad from 1893 to 1896, from Washington to New Orleans, increased $499,700.73.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. These are details of a discussion which I have not cared to go into at this time. I am obliged to my friend for reminding me of those special facts and presenting them to the House; but this question will be discussed in all of its features by other gentlemen, who will go into all the details. I just intended to touch the high places for a moment and pass on.

Mr. Chairman, there is another question that deserves the consideration of this House. It is a question affecting the whole country as perhaps no other question connected with the postal service does. It is a conceded fact that the deficit in the postal receipts is unquestionably produced, to a great extent if not wholly, by the transportation of second-class mail matter. It is estimated that it costs the Government 8 cents per pound to transport this matter for which it gets 1 cent per pound, a loss of 7 cents. It would seem as a matter of good business administration, as a matter of economy, that something ought to be done to remedy this condition; but when we take up the consideration of this question we are met at the very threshold with a policy adopted by the Government in its early history which prevents any radical increase in the rate of postage on this matter if that policy shall be maintained. The Government early adopted the wise policy of fixing a low rate of postage on second-class matter. Looking after the general welfare and interest of the United States, we can not repudiate this early policy of the Government at this time and attempt to make this character of mail matter self-sustaining.

The purpose was to give the literature of the country to the people; the purpose and intention of the Government in fixing that low rate was to encourage learning and letters and let the people be informed of the affairs of the Government; to let the people understand all that a great people ought to know that could come through those channels, to educate them to the high standard of citizenship. There has been perhaps no benefit that has ever accrued to the people of any Government on earth as great as that benefit that has been immediately and directly derived from the concession of the Government in carrying newspapers and magazines and matter of general literature and information. That this privilege under the statute has been abused there can be no question; that the Government might recoup its revenues by an increase in the compensation of postage on second-class matter there can be no question. I believe that the time has come, though, Mr. Chairman, in the United States, with the vast increase of the sources of information, the vast number of papers and magazines and books that we have, that we can now, without doing detriment to the policy pursued in the first place on the part of the Government, raise a little the postage on second-class matter.

If it were an increase of just 1 or 2 cents, saving and reserving from the operation of the law the newspapers to a certain extent of circulation, the revenue might be better and perhaps the literature might be better.

These are questions worthy of the consideration of this committee. Passing from this question I desire for a moment only to detain the House with another suggestion. There is too much discretionary power lodged by law to-day in this Department. There is too much discretionary power lodged in all the Departments. The Congress of the United States, the immediate representatives of the people, ought to assume the responsibility and give their mandates to those servants of the Congress and the people, the Departments and the Government.

There is, perhaps, no better illustration of that fact than may be found in conditions existing to-day. I know nothing of the merits of the controversy between the parties who have been excluded by fraud orders from the mail Department. I assume, in view of the controversy, that there are two sides to the question. It is clear to my mind that if the power is lodged in the Post-Office Department to exclude without the right of appeal or review magazines or any class of literature from the mails, that it is a most oppressive, dangerous, and tyrannous exercise of power.

The Congress has a right to vest not only semijudicial, but semilegislative functions in an administrative body, so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned. But in its vestment, if the provision is not made for an appeal from that judgment; if the law provides no method of procedure for appeal or review, the power of the Department is absolute, arbitrary, and tyrannical, and any citizen may be deprived of his right to-day without a hearing either in the Departments or in the courts of justice.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will my friend tell me what remedy he suggests? The bill could not, unless a point of order was not made——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will reach that question in a few moments. It is a dangerous thing always to vest an executive or an administrative officer with either quasi legislative or quasi judicial power. It is a prolific source of oppression to the citizen. It ought never to be done. This body ought not to shift the responsibility that rests upon it, or properly on judicial officers, and clothe these officers with powers they ought never to possess, if the welfare and interest of the people is to be maintained.

Mr. Chairman, it is useless for us to discuss, as I said, these questions unless there be some remedy for the evils of which we complain. They can not be remedied on an appropriation bill under the rules of the House as they exist to-day. I have no objection to drastic rules in a body of this size. It is unwieldy, and we need the power of the rule even to force legislation, but we do need rules that will operate justly and equally upon every Member and every party in this House. It is unwise for us, in view of the needs of this Government, to tie the Representatives of the people upon this floor. The present rules of the House of Representatives, in my judgment, are dangerous to the welfare of the people; and yet, take them altogether, leaving a few rules out of consideration, it is perhaps as good a code as we could obtain for a body of this size.

The power, though, which the Speaker has, or exercises if he chooses, under the construction of the rule, to turn from a Member and decline to recognize him for the purpose for which he rises, after once recognizing, is a most dangerous power in any parliamentary body. That power which you have given him, and which he exercises as your servant, is a power that ought never to be invoked against the interests of the people in the consideration of legislation. It denies equal opportunities to the membership of the House. It degrades the Representative.

Another rule to which I have referred is this: You prevent upon the consideration of an appropriation bill new legislation. Don't you think it would be wise to modify that rule to the extent that legislation which is germane to a particular subject of consideration may be presented? That is a wise rule to prevent riders being placed on an appropriation bill, riders foreign to the subject of consideration; but right here, right under this bill, at this hour if that rule were modified this House could consider the question of railway-mail pay; it could consider the question of changing the rate of second-class matter; it could consider the question of a usurpation of power under the statute in the Post-Office Department. But you are powerless under the rule which shackles you by your own will to do so. What further remedy have you? Can you appeal to the committee for consideration of these questions by separate bills? You have found those things vain and futile. If you clothe the Speaker with the power to name the committee instead of letting the House of Representatives select its own committeemen as the Senate does, you place it within his power to so organize the committees of this House as to forever defeat legislation coming before the committee, and then you put it beyond your power in this House by the rule to which I have referred of resuming the sovereign power to which you are entitled yourself. You have yielded away your power, you can not help yourselves. The result of this, Mr. Chairman, is that when gentlemen on the floor of this House find that it is impossible to be heard in the interest of their constituents, they yield. When a question arises in this body upon which they ought to have independent judgment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman called down, having control of all the time on this side, will consume a little more of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed beyond the hour.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Just for a little while, Mr. Chairman. We ought to go back to the consideration of these questions as they were considered in the days that are passed. We ought to break the chains of this House on the question of legislation. We ought not to place an autocrat in the Speaker's chair, but the humble servant of the representatives of the people, to do their behest. You put it in his power to destroy legislation. You put yourselves in his power as he forces legislation upon you. The majority party is responsible for this. You yield your rights, and, yielding them, you part with self-respect and become cowards, and when you become cowards you become slaves, and when you become slaves to a coterie of parliamentary despots you become the unfit representatives of a great and a free people. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly agree with what the gentleman has been saying about this rule of not being permitted to legislate on an appropriation bill; but is it not a fact that it does not prevent that new legislation, provided that in the Senate they put on the same amendment that we rejected here in the House? It comes back then, and under the rules, and it is not out of order to consider that which has been once solemnly ruled out of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course, we agree on that question. It can legislate, while this House can not, under the rule.

Mr. SIMS. But the Senate forces us to do it.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The Senate, of course, forces us to do it. The Senate forces us to do nearly all we do. The Republican majority is not to blame alone for this.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The Republican majority in this House has surrendered beyond all question freely and voluntarily all of the reserved rights of a Representative, save one or two, to the Speaker of the House. Now, if anybody has to exercise that power on the Republican side, I would as soon have the present Speaker do it as anybody in the world. It is not a question of the Speaker individually. I believe everybody in this House is personally fond of him. It is a question of the abrogation of the power of the Representatives so as to prevent legislation that is wholesome and just.

I have now demonstrated to the House, I trust, legislation that is needed upon this bill. I defy anyone to get one particle of it. You can not put it on here. You are tied by your rules; you can not put it through your committee, for the Speaker has tied your committee. What are you to do? Gentlemen, there are reserved rights, but only one or two to the House of Representatives.

If without the spirit of revenge or anger, if in obedience to the high dictates of duty, if in recognition of those representative rights which you all possess, you will say to the House of Representatives, "Be bound by the chains you have forged; no business shall be done in this House save by and in accordance technically with every rule that this House has adopted for the transaction of business," and you do that for a few weeks, then this majority and the Speaker will find themselves utterly powerless to move one inch in legislation. They will break the chains themselves, and they will tell the Speaker that he is no longer a master, but a servant of the House of Representatives. How was it in the days that are past? Was this a body in which the will and decree of a political coterie was registered? This was the great forum in which the battles of the people were fought. Here every great battle for American liberty and American citizenship has been fought out in behalf of the people, and to-day, like craven cowards, you have surrendered every right you have, given to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Rules, and without the slightest deliberation you pass for consideration to the other end of the Capitol every bill nearly that is before you.

Without naming any particular bill, but to show the evil effect of that and of ill-considered legislation, a bill is to-day pending, upon which this House has acted, affecting a great Territory proposed to be made a State, greater than the State of Missouri, where this House actually failed to extend, so far as some necessary provisions were concerned, the benefit of the law proposed to be enacted to a part of the Territory—unintentionally, of course. No consideration in committee, no consideration anywhere, until the Senate of the United States pointed out, to the shame of the House of Representatives, the patent defect. You gentlemen can not go back to the country and accuse the Republican party of all the wrongs that the people suffer at the hands of this once great but now degenerate body. The Democracy of the House of Representatives must exercise the reserved power of refusing and forbidding anything to be done, save in obedience to the law that the House has made for its government, and then the people will see where the chains are and who forged them, and they will put an end, I trust, to the wrongs and injustices that exist here.

Mr. SIMS. We witnessed the spectacle a few days ago of two Representatives on this floor, one a member of the Republican party and one a member of the Democratic party, who undertook to have one bill passed according to the general rules of this House, and the Committee on Rules got together and decided that the general rules were the worst thing possible to apply to that appropriation bill; and they brought in a special rule, repealing the general rules and making in order everything that had gone out on points of order as well as all that remained. Is not that a fact?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Can not they do that with every single bill, as long as the majority is subservient to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Of course, that may be so; there is no question about that, and the gentleman simply amplifies the suggestion I made.

Mr. SIMS. What are you going to do about it? Let us get down to something practical.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I was just suggesting to you a practical solution of it. Suppose when a gentleman gets on the floor of the House of Representatives and asks unanimous consent and the Speaker recognized the gentleman for unanimous consent; suppose you have no objection to the bill, but have objection to the exercise of that power emanating from one source alone, a power that practically controls the operations of the House, you have the reserved right as a Representative to say, "I object." That places the gentleman who made the motion in his seat. How is he going to get his bill up?

Mr. SIMS. I can answer that if the gentleman asks me.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. He can not do it except upon call of committees on the day when it is reached, and the chances are only one in a hundred he can reach it then. He can not go to the Union Calendar and take a bill off that Calendar. There are three-fourths of the important bills of the House upon that Calendar, and that Calendar, by virtue of the power of the Speaker, has not been called for general consideration in ten long years in the House of Representatives. You can consider on it those things he favors only without unanimous consent or a special rule, and he controls recognition and is chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The gentleman will excuse me just a moment.

Mr. SIMS. Then go ahead.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. No; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. Then what is to hinder the Committee on Rules from selecting out these very bills to which objection has been made and bringing in a special rule that they shall be considered without any reference to unanimous consent?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Well, what hinders the House of Representatives from exercising its power to overturn the Committee on Rules?

Mr. SIMS. Well, I thought the gentleman answered a while ago that we had about lost all self-respect and courage and everything else.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Oh, I think not; I did not mean to say and did not say that, Mr. Chairman. I meant to say that we had lost the power of resistance.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I heard you say something in your remarks relative to the degeneracy of the Democracy on this side of the House. I ask the gentleman the question—inasmuch as you called us degenerate—if when we were in power and Mr. Crisp, of Georgia, was Speaker the same rules were not substantially adopted then as are adopted now?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes; and they were just as infamous then as they are now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SIMS. I am not contending against what the gentleman says. I only wanted to find some way to do what he wants done.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I am not excusing—I can not excuse the present membership of this House from refusing to exercise its power in behalf of the people because some Democratic Congress did the same thing. I am a Democrat in every essential principle that the party has ever advocated, but I fear not to say that some of the greatest wrongs ever done to mankind were in the name of the Democratic party. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have already extended these impromptu suggestions far beyond what I intended. Now, I desire to yield twenty minutes to Mr. TOWNE, the gentleman from New York. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to subscribe very cordially to some of the remarks—indeed, practically to all of them—of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee who has just resumed his seat, addressed to the subject of the rules of this House; but I wish to enter one important qualification in respect to the criticisms that are passed upon the Speaker. The Speaker is, in my judgment, almost as much sinned against as sinning. The fact that under both Republican and Democratic régimes very largely the same complaint has been made in respect to the exercise of quasi autocratic power by the Chair is itself a recognition to a considerable degree that the necessity for exercising that kind of power inheres in the duties of the office itself as it has evolved in our system.

Now, sir, I am not prepared at this moment to enter upon a careful discussion of certain matters that I wish merely to indicate for the sober consideration, in this connection, of the men who, as I hope, are to participate in the framing of the rules for the Sixtieth Congress. [Applause.] I mean the Democrats of this body. [Renewed applause.]

The Speakership of this House, sir, in its origin was not a political office. It is interesting to contrast it with the history of the speakership of the English House of Commons, whence we borrow very largely the model upon which this House is constructed. In the House of Commons the speaker is a mere moderator, who presides over a parliamentary body for the purpose of enforcing ordinary parliamentary rules. The office has no political significance. That fact is illustrated by the recent reelection of Mr. Lowther, the Conservative speaker, by the new enormous Liberal majority in the House of Commons.

If a speaker is a competent parliamentarian, a fair man, and a man of ability, no majority in the English Parliament cares to which party he belongs. But originally the English speaker was a political officer. His name signifies it. He spoke for the Commons with the King, and to a considerable degree was able to direct the deliberations of the House and to select the subjects upon which it should deliberate. In process of time there developed the English ministry, the responsible element in the control of the legislative in the British system. The ministry determines all the initiative in legislation, marks out the programme for the Commons, determines what propositions of legislation shall come before that body; and the opposition—I may interpolate at this point—has always the right to propose and discuss amendments. That function is ever the great factor in that general system of government to which the English Commons and this body belong, a system that the great commentator Bagehot has called a government by discussion; and if at any time this House shall ever have its ancient dignity and power restored and shall again appeal to the imagination and respect of the people of America, it will be when it shall have vindicated for itself the right to discuss all public measures proposed here. [Loud applause.] But in America we have never evolved anything that answers to the British cabinet or ministerial system. There must, however, in every majority temporarily controlling the deliberations of this House, be somewhere an initiative, the power of determining the policy according to which the majority shall choose to proceed, and how it shall exercise that power. It is interesting to note how this function has become an asset of our Speakership, an evolution in that office having occurred directly opposite from that which marked the English speakership. Speaker Muhlenberg, the first Speaker of the House of Representatives, nearly one hundred and twenty years ago, was a mere presiding officer, but in the course of time the officer who commenced as a mere moderator has developed into the most powerful political functionary in our Government.

I do not propose at this moment, and without preparation, to undertake a discussion of the philosophy implied in the fact I have cited. I shall merely suggest whether in this proposed and desirable reform of the rules of the House we are not face to face with more than a mere question of convenience, a deep question of government indeed, complicated with the evolution of our system itself. But there are some things that those who propose to reform these rules can entertain little difference about. One of them was suggested very ably by the gentleman from Tennessee in answer to a question. We can change the rules of the House. We can if we will. We will not if we submit ourselves to the dictation of a few men on grounds of alleged party interest and refuse to stand in favor of the inherent legislative rights of the House. The majority party can, if it will, make a few simple changes in the rules that will go a great way to restore the ancient capacities and prestige of the House.

For instance, now, if a man on the floor of this House desires to challenge the attention of the Chair he must arise in his place and address the Speaker; and, as I think the language of the rule is—although I have not seen it lately—"upon being recognized, he shall proceed in order." If he is not recognized he can not proceed, and we witness this anomalous and insulting thing—although the Speaker is not in a personal sense to blame for it, let me say, it is inherent in the rules—that a man representing a great American constituency, with something to speak about and to think about and to propose to this great body on his individual and political responsibility, arises in his place here and the Speaker says to him, "For what purpose does the gentleman rise?" And if the purpose does not suit the Speaker the Member has not, to any effectual purpose, arisen at all, but has to take his seat.

Now, sir, when two or more men are contemporaneously challenging the attention of the Chair, it is a mere necessity that he shall choose which one to recognize. No rule can ever obviate that; but it has happened time and again—it happened in my own case in the Fifty-fourth Congress—that but one Member is asking recognition from the Chair, and that he can not get the floor. Now, I undertake to say that any Representative of a great constituency of the American people upon this floor has a right, or ought to have the right, to ask the attention of the Chair and the House to anything he wishes to bring to the attention of this assembly when nobody else is claiming the floor at the same time. [Applause.]

Now, sir, this by way of unsystematic and scarcely tangible connection with an extraneous matter to which I desire, under the latitudinous necessity of these same rules [laughter], very briefly to invoke the attention of the House.

The right of labor to organize is nowhere now seriously questioned. That, on the whole, the exercise of that right has been greatly beneficial to the vast body of wage-earners, and, hence, of benefit to the country, whose welfare is so intimately dependent upon theirs, is likewise generally admitted. To say this is not to deny that here and there ambition and self-interest have committed wrongs in the name of labor and, using the instruments of its organization for private purposes, have put in peril the credit of the cause itself; it is not even to deny that trades-unions and labor federations, in the clash of interests that has attended the phenomenal industrial changes of recent times, may occasionally have exceeded the limit prescribed by a just subordination of class concern to the general welfare of society. But it is right to remember that the organization of labor did not precede, but followed, the organization of capital; that its very origin was in defense, not in aggression.

But these considerations only enforce the necessity of a clearer understanding between organized labor on one hand and the manifold interests of society on the other, to the end that public sentiment shall both recognize the just claims of labor and insist in turn that it shall respect necessary and salutary limitations in its organized effort to secure them.

Under our representative institutions it is inevitable that citizens should seek to influence the enactment and enforcement of laws deemed by them likely to improve their social and industrial conditions. Wage-earners can not be expected to be oblivious of this privilege. Indeed, it has always been one of the chief arguments of the party in power in favor of its continued supremacy that its policies were largely shaped to achieve the welfare of the laboring man. Accordingly, it is not surprising that these policies should be subjected to close scrutiny by the men whom the competition of leadership has brought to the front in labor councils, men like Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, John Mitchell, president of the Coal Miners' Union, Andrew Furuseth, president of the International Seamen's Union, and many others of similar ability and influence.

One consequence of this scrutiny has been the formulation by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor of a petition for redress of grievances, addressed, and on Wednesday, March 21, formally presented, to the President of the United States, the President pro tempore of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

This petition, sir, which is quite the most significant utterance of the sort in recent economic history, contains a recital of the principal complaints which organized labor conceives itself to have against the powers now and for some time past responsible for the legislative and administrative policies of the country. These complaints may be thus conveniently summarized:

First. They complain that the eight-hour law is grievously and frequently violated; that since 1894 they have vainly sought to secure legislation remedying the defects of that law and extending its provisions to all work done on behalf of the Government; that recently, without a hearing to the advocates of eight-hour legislation, a law was passed by Congress and signed by the President, as a rider on an appropriation bill, "nullifying the eight-hour law and principle in its application to the greatest public work ever undertaken by our Government—the construction of the Panama Canal."

Second. They complain that no heed has been paid to labor's request for legislation safeguarding it against the competition of convicts.

Third. They complain that no result has followed their demand for relief against the evils of "induced and undesirable immigration;" that the Chinese-exclusion law is being "flagrantly violated," and that it is now "seriously proposed to invalidate that law" and reverse our policy.

Fourth. They complain that equal rights are denied to seamen; that even the partial relief afforded them by the laws of 1895 and 1898 have been threatened at each succeeding Congress; that petitions in behalf of the seamen have been denied "and a disposition shown to extend to other workmen the system of compulsory labor," and that, "under the guise of a bill to subsidize the shipping industry, a provision is incorporated, and has already passed the Senate, providing for a form of conscription which would make compulsory naval service a condition precedent to employment on privately owned vessels."

Fifth. They complain that undermanning and unskilled manning of vessels are largely responsible for disasters like the burning of the Slocum in New York Harbor and the wreck of the Rio de Janeiro at San Francisco, with their terrible and unnecessary loss of human life, and that measures presented by them more in the interest of the public than of themselves, calculated to prevent such calamities, have not been adopted.

Sixth. They complain that they have vainly sought the passage of a law prescribing that barges towed at sea shall be properly manned and equipped so as to avoid the loss of life now frequently involved in cutting them loose during storms and leaving the crews to perish.

Seventh. They complain that the "antitrust and interstate-commerce laws enacted to protect the people against monopoly in the products of labor, and against discrimination in the transportation thereof, have been perverted, so far as the laborers are concerned, so as to invade and violate their personal liberty as guaranteed by the Constitution," and that their repeated efforts to obtain redress from Congress have been in vain.

Eighth. They complain of the abuse of the "beneficent writ of injunction" in labor disputes, claiming that it has been perverted from the protection of property rights to the destruction of personal freedom, and that there is a threat of "statutory authority for existing judicial usurpation."

Ninth. They complain that the committees of this House having jurisdiction of matters particularly of interest to labor have been constituted inimically to it, and that requests to the Speaker to remedy this condition as apparent in the last two Congresses have been followed in the present Congress by even an accentuation of the condition.

Tenth. They complain that the constitutional right of petition has been invaded by the Executive order recently issued "forbidding any and all Government employees, upon pain of instant dismissal from the Government service, to petition Congress for any redress of grievances or for any improvement in their condition."

In view of the interest and importance of this document, Mr. Chairman, I ask consent to print it as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from New York will be granted, unless there be objection.

There was no objection.

The document is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21, 1906.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States;
Hon. WM. P. FRYE,
President pro tempore, United States Senate;
Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker House of Representatives, United States.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned executive council of the American Federation of Labor, and those accompanying us in the presentation of this document, submit to you the subject-matters of the grievances which the workmen of our country feel by reason of the indifferent position which the Congress of the United States has manifested toward the just, reasonable, and necessary measures which have been before it these past several years, and which particularly affect the interests of the working people, as well as by reason of the administrative acts of the executive branches of this Government and the legislation of the Congress relating to these interests. For convenience the matters of which we complain are briefly stated, and are as follows:

The law commonly known as the "eight-hour law" has been found ineffective and insufficient to accomplish the purpose of its designers and framers. Labor has, since 1894, urged the passage of a law so as to remedy the defects, and for its extension to all work done for or on behalf of the Government. Our efforts have been in vain.

Without hearing of any kind granted to those who are the advocates of the eight-hour law and principle, Congress passed and the President signed an appropriation bill containing a rider nullifying the eight-hour law and principle in its application to the greatest public work ever undertaken by our Government, the construction of the Panama Canal.

The eight-hour law in terms provides that those intrusted with the supervision of Government work shall neither require nor permit any violations thereof. The law has been grievously and frequently violated. The violations have been reported to the heads of several Departments, who have refused to take the necessary steps for its enforcement.

While recognizing the necessity for the employment of inmates of our penal institutions so that they may be self-supporting, labor has urged in vain the enactment of a law that shall safeguard it from the competition of the labor of convicts.

In the interest of all of our people and in consonance with their almost general demand, we have urged Congress for some tangible relief from the constantly growing evil of induced and undesirable immigration, but without result.

Recognizing the danger of Chinese immigration and responsive to the demands of the people, Congress years ago enacted an effective Chinese-exclusion law, yet despite the experience of the people of our own country, as well as those of other countries, the present law is flagrantly violated, and now, by act of Congress, it is seriously proposed to invalidate that law and reverse the policy.

The partial relief secured by the laws of 1895 and 1898, providing that seamen shall not be compelled to endure involuntary servitude, has been seriously threatened at each succeeding Congress. The petitions to secure for the seamen equal right with all others have been denied and a disposition shown to extend to other workmen the system of compulsory labor.

Under the guise of a bill to subsidize the shipping industry a provision is incorporated, and has already passed the Senate, providing for a form of conscription, which would make compulsory naval service a condition precedent to employment on privately owned vessels.

Having in mind the terrible and unnecessary loss of life attending the burning of the Slocum in the harbor of New York, the wreck of the Rio de Janeiro at the entrance to the Bay of San Francisco, and other disasters on the waters too numerous to mention, in nearly every case the great loss of life was due to the undermanning and the unskilled manning of such vessels, we presented to Congress measures that would, if enacted, so far as human law could do, make impossible the awful loss of life. We have sought this remedy more in the interests of the traveling public than in that of the seamen, but in vain.

Having in mind the constantly increasing evil growing out of the parsimony of corporations, of towing several undermanned and unequipped vessels called "barges," on the high seas, where, in case of storm or stress, they are cut loose to drift or sink, and their crews to perish, we have urged the passage of a law that shall forbid the towing of more than one such vessel unless they shall have an equipment and a crew sufficient to manage them when cut loose and sent adrift, but in vain.

The antitrust and interstate-commerce laws enacted to protect the people against monopoly in the products of labor, and against discrimination in the transportation thereof, have been perverted, so far as the laborers are concerned, so as to invade and violate their personal liberty, as guaranteed by the Constitution. Our repeated efforts to obtain redress from Congress have been in vain.

The beneficent writ of injunction intended to protect property rights has, as used in labor disputes, been perverted so as to attack and destroy personal freedom, and in a manner to hold that the employer has some property rights in the labor of the workmen. Instead of obtaining the relief which labor has sought, it is seriously threatened with statutory authority for existing judicial usurpation.

The Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives was instituted at the demand of labor to voice its sentiments, to advocate its rights, and to protect its interests. In the past two Congresses this committee has been so organized as to make ineffectual any attempt labor has made for redress. This being the fact, in the last Congress labor requested the Speaker to appoint on the Committee on Labor Members who, from their experience, knowledge, and sympathy, would render in this Congress such service as the committee was originally designed to perform. Not only was labor's request ignored, but the hostile make-up of the committee was accentuated.

Recently the President issued an order forbidding any and all Government employees, upon the pain of instant dismissal from the Government service, to petition Congress for any redress of grievances or for any improvement in their condition. Thus the constitutional right of citizens to petition must be surrendered by the Government employee in order that he may obtain or retain his employment.

We present these grievances to your attention because we have long, patiently, and in vain waited for redress. There is not any matter of which we have complained but for which we have, in an honorable and lawful manner, submitted remedies. The remedies for these grievances proposed by labor are in line with fundamental law, and with the progress and development made necessary by changed industrial conditions.

Labor brings these its grievances to your attention because you are the Representatives responsible for legislation and for failure of legislation. The toilers come to you as your fellow-citizens, who, by reason of their position in life, have not only, with all other citizens, an equal interest in our country, but the further interest of being the burden bearers, the wage-earners of America. As labor's representatives we ask you to redress these grievances, for it is in your power so to do.

Labor now appeals to you, and we trust that it may not be in vain. But if perchance you may not heed us, we shall appeal to the conscience and the support of our fellow-citizens.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
JAMES DUNCAN,
JAMES O'CONNELL,

Mr. TOWNE. It is not necessary that a man should subscribe in detail to all the allegations of this petition in order to be in general accord with its spirit. No candid observer of recent history can fail to know that the political party now in power in this country is, as an organization, the agent of the dominant economic forces of the age; a fate, let me say, which is not at all unprecedented or unusual. Such a state of affairs occurs to a greater or less extent, no matter which party is in power. The economic forces of the age will impress themselves upon the tendencies of legislation, through the control of the dominant party, from time to time, in all self-governing communities; which fact only emphasizes, however, the necessity of changing parties from time to time in order to give contrary tendencies a chance to express themselves in the corrective legislation that may thus result. [Applause.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. A change of bosses.

Mr. TOWNE. Yes; if bosses be necessary, Heaven knows they should be changed. And, Mr. Chairman, it is also true that those economic forces tend to capitalistic combination and consolidation; that, if unrestrained and unregulated, they threaten the stability of the social order, and that the workingmen of the country may justly feel an especial interest in curbing the rapacity of these organized appetites which exist, either by the warrant or by the permission of the laws. In this enterprise these petitioners become allies of all members of society not immediately associated in schemes of spoliation and plunder. When thus engaged they cease to be a faction, but become the representatives of the general welfare. Instead of meriting the appellation of agitators and disturbers, they range themselves among the conservative elements of our institutions in furtherance of what has become the great patriotic political duty of the hour; the restoration in the Republic of the ancient standards of justice and equality under the law, the mingled safety and progress that constitute the goal and the sanction of democratical government. [Prolonged applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STERLING having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8461) to amend chapter 1495, Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," as amended by section 9 of chapter 1479, Revised Statutes of the United States, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. CLARK of Montana, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. GAMBLE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5059. An act to increase the limit of cost of the post-office at Yankton, S. Dak.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate (No. 13) authorizing the reprinting of 10,000 additional copies of the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in the consideration of the so-called "railroad rates bill," and a digest of said testimony prepared under the direction of said committee.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire during the time that has been allotted to me to discuss the somewhat misunderstood and complicated question of railway mail pay. Before doing so, I desire to refer briefly to the situation of this appropriation bill in committee and in this House. Of course, we understood that no general legislation could be placed on this bill without being subject to a point of order, and therefore the committee did not undertake a general investigation of this most important subject. It being necessary, however, to make an appropriation for the railway transportation of mails, the matter was incidentally discussed; especially was it discussed with reference to this item which has come up before Congress at the last three sessions, and several Congresses before, about special facility pay to this particular line, and which seems to have friends on both sides of the Chamber.

It is in order to leave that appropriation out, because it is an appropriation that is simply annual, and it appears with every appropriation bill. This matter, brought before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, brought out a good deal of dissension, and when the matter was submitted to the full committee they were practically evenly divided; those who supported the special-facility pay and those who favored it reserved the right to discuss it on the floor of the House. Everyone is at perfect liberty to discuss it.

Now, that is the parliamentary situation as I understand it, and I expect to support an amendment striking out the special-facility pay. Before doing so I desire to discuss the basis upon which railroad mail pay in general is awarded and what that pay is. This I deem to be necessary, if the House will indulge me, because there seems to be a great deal of misinformation upon the subject.

I have seen articles in the newspapers relative to this matter which were entirely misleading, and there is a general misunderstanding as to what extent pay is proportioned to a just compensation.

A few days ago an article from the Washington Post was inserted in the RECORD relative to a certain railroad in Michigan. I received from that railroad a circular containing an answer, and I introduce this simply as a sample of the misinformation circulated throughout the United States on the subject of railroad mail pay. As a matter of fact, I expect to convince the House, or at least those who do me the honor to listen, that although the pay to the railroad where the traffic is light is twenty times as much per pound as where it is heavy, yet it actually, in proportion to the expense of the service, is too small, or at least is very small pay, and if there is any overpay at all it is to the railroads that do a large business. I will read this extract which was put in the RECORD two or three days ago:

The little railroad running from Pontiac to Caseville, Mich., is 100 miles long. Two trains carry mail on this route, the daily weight of the mail being 926 pounds. The United States pays $8,262 a year for this service. The trains also carry passengers and express. The total cost of operating these two trains is $14,160 a year. The United States, therefore, pays 58 per cent of the cost of operation.

Now, here is the answer which the railroad company officials, I assume, sent in this circular:

The foregoing paragraph contains four false statements:

1. The cost of operating this road, which it is proper to consider and estimate in connection with the receipts from carriage of mails, was $149,400, and not $14,160.

2. The railroad paid out of its mail pay for delivery of the mails at fifteen points, $1,240, so that its real compensation was $7,022, and not $8,262.

3. The compensation of this road for carrying the mails was 5 per cent of the expense of operation, and not 58 per cent.

4. The road, instead of being overpaid for the service it is performing for the Government in mail transportation, is much underpaid.

What are the facts? This little railroad begins at Pontiac, Mich. Its total receipts are barely sufficient to meet its operating expenses and taxes. It is in the hands of a receiver. The receiver recently visited Washington in the vain endeavor to secure an increase in their mail pay. The operating expenses of the road were, last year, $149,400. These expenses included taxes, the expense of maintaining the roadway and bridges, renewals of ties and iron, telegraph and station service, clerical service, superintendence, and the other ordinary expense of operation.

How is the service performed by this road for the Government in furnishing the mails to the people of this Congressional district?

It is performed entirely in apartment cars, which are provided by the railroad, the space set apart and fitted up in one car for a distributing post-office, in which a mail clerk travels, being 18 feet, and in another 12 feet—one-half the car in each case.

Deducting the expense of messenger service, this Pontiac railroad receives $22.50 per day for serving twenty-two towns and stations along 100 miles of road with four daily mails, or $1 per town. It provides half a car, fitted up as a post-office, in a passenger train, and carries a mail clerk in each car, who distributes 926 pounds of mail, all for $22.50 per day, while two passengers carried on each of the same trains pay $22.80 in fares. The two passengers might occupy one seat; the mails always occupy half the car, which transports the messenger as well as the mails.

Taking the country over, upon all railroads where the weight is light and mails are carried in apartment cars, in which half the car is fitted up for a post-office and a messenger is transported, the actual pay received by the road, deducting the expense for delivery to post-offices within a quarter of a mile of the station, will not exceed two full passenger fares on the same train.

The mail pay of the Pontiac road, performed in this exceptionally expensive manner, such as is not done and would not be done for any other patron, amounts to 6.54 cents per mile of service, or lower than the average pay per mile of star route service in this country.

The average pay per mile of rural free-delivery service is 10.57 cents, or 60 per cent more than the Pontiac road receives per mile for performing an altogether more valuable and expeditious and useful mail service.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to suggest that Mr. Bennett did not attempt to give the whole cost of the operation of the road for the year, but it was only in the case of two trains.

Mr. STEENERSON. I don't know. I don't know whether the facts sent me in this circular are correct, but I assume that they are. This railroad affords a fair illustration of the principle that I shall try to make plain—that the pay is largest per pound where the traffic is the lightest, and yet it is the least remunerative; that if there is any overpayment anywhere it is on those roads where the mail traffic is very heavy.

This is a fair sample of that misinformation that is scattered throughout the country and which we often hear even on this floor. I recollect in the last Congress I heard one gentleman speak of the fact that we paid in rent every year for R. P. O. cars more than they cost. Of course that is true, or approximately so, but we should take into consideration the fact that in an R. P. O. car weighing 100,000 pounds probably a maximum load of 10,000 pounds of mail is carried, so that there are ten parts of dead weight to one part of live freight to be drawn and consequently the extra pay for moving that car three hundred and sixty-five days each way on a line is not unreasonable pay. But in regard to the operation of the law upon which railway mail pay is adjusted, I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], who deplores the fact that we are appropriating more and more money in this bill for railway service, is certainly mistaken about that being a deplorable fact. It is an evidence of health and growth. What difference does it make how much we appropriate for transportation of mail if we get an increased traffic? None at all. I desire to say in reference to a remark made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]—and I will say right here that there is no man on the floor of this House for whom I entertain a higher opinion—that the increase in the appropriation is due to the growth of the transportation, and I call attention to the fact that when this great postal investigation was carried on, from 1899 to 1901, for three long years by the so-called Postal Commission, when every railway accountant of any prominence in the United States was heard, and where they employed one of the greatest experts in that branch of science that is known in the United States, Professor Adams, of the University of Michigan, professor of economics and finance and also statistician for the Interstate Commerce Commission, this subject was investigated, and the result, after a special weighing throughout the United States in 1899, arrived at was that the United States Government paid out for railway transportation proper 35 per cent of its postal receipts. That was for the year 1899.

Now, I believe those figures of Professor Adams have never been disputed, even by his critics, for I notice that Professor Newcomb, who severely criticised his figures in some respects, does not dispute that. That was at that time less, I believe, than was paid in England or in any country in Europe. I have here a table which I have prepared, showing that in the next year, 1900, that of the total receipts for postal service, without counting R. P. O. cars and special facility, the railway transportation amounted to 34½ per cent. The next year we expended 32 per cent of total receipts for railway transportation of mails. The next year it was 30⅓ per cent of the total receipts for transportation by rail. The next year, 1902, we expended 28½ per cent of the total receipts for railway mail transportation. The next year, 1903, we expended 27⅓ per cent of total receipts for railway mail transportation. In 1904 we expended 26¾ per cent, and in 1905, the last year for which there are any statistics, we expended 26 13/16 per cent. However, I do not think it is fair to figure railway mail transportation without including R. P. O. pay and special-facility pay, if there is any, because it is all paid for railway transportation. I figure that for last year, counting the whole amount of $5,000,000 for R. P. O. cars, or traveling post-offices, as they have been called, and special facility included, still the total we paid for railway transportation of mails was only 29½ per cent of the total receipts for postal service. So that we have decreased the proportion since 1899 from 35 per cent to 29 per cent, a decrease of over 6 per cent in the proportion that we pay for railway mail transportation to the total revenue from the postal service. This is a very significant fact.

Table showing percentage of railway mail pay to postal receipts.

Year.	Receipts.	Expenditures.	Railway transportation expenses, exclusive of R. P. O. and special facility.	Per cent of receipts.
1900	$102,345,579.29	$107,740,267.99	$32,993,076.00	32½
1901	111,631,193.39	115,554,920.87	33,527,333.00	30⅓
1902	121,848,047.26	124,785,697.07	34,715,864.00	28½
1903	134,224,443.24	138,784,487.97	36,720,833.00	27⅓
1904	143,582,624.34	152,362,116.70	38,556,551.62	26¾
1905	152,826,685.10	167,399,169.23	39,384,916.17	26 13/16

In 1905 the expenditure for railway transportation, including R. P. O. and special facility, was $45,061,689.57, or 29½ per cent of the total receipts.

I desire now to discuss as briefly as I possibly can the law under which this pay is allowed in order that we may understand the bearing it has upon this special-facility pay and the other questions involved. The law of 1873, as my friend from Tennessee, Judge MOON, said, was passed more than a quarter of a century ago, but the fact that it automatically operates to reduce railway mail pay in general shows that the principle upon which it is based is a sound one. When the law was passed the following were the rates, and I shall insert a copy of that provision of the law in the RECORD: Rate allowable under the act of 1873, pay per mile per annum, 200 pounds, $50; 200 to 500 pounds, $75; 500 pounds to 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,000 pounds to 1,500 pounds, $125; 1,500 pounds to 2,000 pounds, $150; 2,000 pounds to 3,500 pounds, $175; 3,500 pounds to 5,000 pounds, $200; for every additional 2,000 pounds over 5,000 pounds, $25.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why did the sliding scale stop at 5,000 pounds?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will explain my views upon that subject in due time. It is a very pertinent question.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. SIBLEY. The gentleman gives this table. Of course he recognizes the fact that that was modified by the act of 1878.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, I will say that I will explain that in a moment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Well, while the gentleman is elucidating that, I wish he would keep in mind that the New York Central in 1874 had an average daily weight of 32,000 pounds. It has to-day an average daily weight of 411,000 pounds.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will come to that, and I am very glad the gentleman reminds me of it, because it is possible to forget it, although it is the very essence of my argument. I would say that these roads were reduced by the act of——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman just permit one question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Minnesota said that by the act of 1873 the Government was to pay $50 for 200 pounds. What does that mean?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will explain. It means the average weight of mail per day carried over the whole length of route. Now, suppose that the route is 50 miles long and you carry that mail over that route out and back.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Two hundred pounds.

Mr. STEENERSON. Two hundred pounds, up to two hundred, a hundred and ninety-nine, or a hundred and fifty. If you carry that mail both ways going and coming for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, every day in the year, you are allowed $50, which I will say will amount to something like $2 per ton per mile.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. Right there in that connection will the gentleman state about what is the average distance which mail is carried?

Mr. STEENERSON. I have it on some papers in connection with another part of my argument, but if the gentleman will inform me I will be glad to state it now.

Mr. FINLEY. I am not sure that I can inform the gentleman from Minnesota, but I think it is about 428 miles.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Wisconsin asked this question: What does that $50 mean? To earn that $50 I say you have to carry mail outward and back every day in the year. It means 730 times over that route.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does that mean 200 pounds out and 200 back for $50 a year?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly; it is per ton per mile—it is ton mileage.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That was the privilege of the people, to carry that amount of mail for that money; but suppose, on certain particular roads out in the country, they did not average 10 pounds or 15 pounds a day instead of 200 pounds?

Mr. STEENERSON. The same rate of pay per pound would apply where you carry 10 pounds a day. It was reduced by the act of 1876 10 per cent, and by the act of 1878 it was reduced horizontally 5 per cent, but now——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was the rate per ton per mile?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will tell you the rate per ton per mile. At the reduction of 15 and 10 per cent made by those two acts it was figured out——

Mr. LLOYD rose.

Mr. STEENERSON. Just excuse me a moment. It was figured out, and it made 171 cents per ton per mile. That is the highest rate for transportation of mail that is paid in the United States. Then, where the weight is more than 200 pounds, on this sliding scale, as you will observe, decreases the per ton mail rate until you reach an absolute quantity—that is, about 5.8 cents per ton per mile. Now I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LLOYD. In your statement a moment ago I understood you to say if they carried 199 pounds out and 199 pounds back they would get paid for carrying 199 pounds. Is it not a fact they would get paid for carrying twice 199 pounds, or 398 pounds?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; you get paid for the average weight over the whole route.

Mr. LLOYD. You get pay by adding the average mail carried out and the average amount of mail carried back?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; but you must understand it is as far going as coming. You may have a ton of mail, and it makes no difference whether you move it forward or back, it is ton-mileage rate.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. In your illustration in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin a moment ago you used a route of 50 miles long. Suppose the route was 250 miles long; how would that affect your answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. STEENERSON. It has absolutely no effect whatever what the length of the route may be. The principle of this compensation under this act of 1873 operates equally so far as the length of route is concerned. The route is fixed by the Department for convenience in computation and in pay and for other facilities.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Can you tell what is the average price per pound for carrying the mail?

Mr. STEENERSON. The average per ton per mile?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. No; the average per pound.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; but that is so small I can not see that fraction, but I can tell you what it was in 1899, according to the statistician. It was figured out to be 12½ cents per ton per mile—that is, moving a ton of mail. That mail is costing to-day on an average of probably 10½ cents, but no man living could tell what the pay on the different roads would be unless you take it up, figure out the total number of pounds, and divide it by the amount paid.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. That is 12½ cents.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes. That is the average given by Professor Adams for 1899.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. How would that compare with the freight rates of the country?

Mr. STEENERSON. The freight rates of the country were then about 1.29 cents.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Now, do you think that difference is fair?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am not arguing in favor of placing the railway-mail pay on the same basis as paid for freight, although I am in favor of and, as I will show before I get through, I might perhaps be willing to reduce the railway-mail pay. I do not think it would be fair to require the railroads to carry the mail for the same price as is paid for freight on freight trains.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Do you not think that is too wide—between that and 12½ cents per ton?

Mr. STEENERSON. That difference does not exist now; because of the density of the population and greater mail traffic the rate per ton per mile has decreased, and it is approaching about 10 cents now. The 12½ rate was in 1899. By the operation of the law of 1873 the rate has automatically gone down with the increase in density of mail.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it not true under your statement that a cent per ton is too much on freight and that it is about five-eights of a cent?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; the gentleman is mistaken; the lowest freight rate per ton is seventy-two one-hundredths of a cent.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. I think that is correct. It is seventy-two one-hundredths of a cent.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think it is about seventy-five one-hundredths. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] knows.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. About seventy-two one hundredths.

Mr. STEENERSON. That was in 1902, when you introduced your bill, and by reason of raising the classification in the country, the freight rate is now seventy-four one-hundredths of a cent.

Mr. FINLEY. I will call the gentleman's attention to this fact for information, that in the last few years there has been a slight increase in freight rates, and my recollection is that it is now about seventy-nine one-hundredths or seventy-eight one-hundredths.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I believe there has been; but it is less than a cent per ton per mile for freight, and we pay the lowest rate on mail that we ever did. We pay 6 cents per ton per mile on the densest route, such as the New York Central. And it is impossible, I would say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], to get a lower rate until we amend the law of 1873, and I will show later on in my argument the reason for that.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Is it not a fact that the average passenger rate per mile is under 2 cents?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think it is less than 2 cents per mile, but I do not see what that has got to do with the exact question we are now discussing.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fundamental principles of this matter. I want to call attention to the fact that we have three kinds of compensation for transporting the mails. First, we have the law of 1873. The estimate in 1900 was that we paid on an average 12½ cents per ton per mile, and the lowest possible rate was 5.8 cents per ton per mile, according to the density of traffic. We have in addition to that pay for R. P. O. cars—railway post-offices, so called—and they are post-offices. The usual car to-day is 60 feet long and the weight 100,000 pounds. There is some dispute about its capacity. The supposed usual load is 10,000 pounds. That is 5 tons, and that is the heaviest load for the heaviest car. Ten thousand pounds out of 100,000 pounds is as ten to one, so that they are hauling very much less than their own weight. The freight car only carries about half as much dead weight as it carries freight. I think the 60,000-pound car—that is, 30-ton car—only weighs about 15 tons, so it carries twice as much as its own weight, whereas the R. P. O. car carries about one-tenth of its own weight. So, consequently, we can not expect the railroad companies will haul them at great speed around the country for the purpose of enabling the postal service to distribute the mail in them without a just compensation. We must remember that in these R. P. O. cars there is at least half of the space occupied by furniture and space for the clerks to distribute the mails. It is a moving post-office, where men are engaged distributing to the different places, and also to the different routes in the cities and the rural post-offices. That gives us expedition in the mails and is a great facility, and that is the function of our R. P. O. cars. For that reason Congress provided that for the 40-foot car we should pay $25 per mile per year.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. And is it not a fact that when that law was passed there was not a 60-foot car in Government use?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not know. The R. P. O. pay for a 45-foot car is $25 per mile per year, and the R. P. O. pay for a 55 to 60 foot car is $50 per mile per year. I will insert the table furnished by the Post-Office Department:

Rates allowable per mile, per annum, for use of R. P. O. cars when authorized.

	Per daily line.
R. P. O. cars, 40 feet	$25
R. P. O. cars, 45 feet	30
R. P. O. cars, 50 feet	40
R. P. O. cars, 55–60 feet	50

To constitute a "line" of railway post-office cars between given points, sufficient R. P. O. cars must be provided and run to make a trip daily each way between those points.

SEC. 4002. The Postmaster-General is authorized and directed to readjust the compensation hereafter to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter mentioned:

First. That the mails shall be conveyed with due frequency and speed; and that sufficient and suitable room, fixtures, and furniture in a car or apartment properly lighted and warmed, shall be provided for route agents to accompany and distribute the mails.

Second. That the pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates, namely: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of 200 pounds, $50; 500 pounds, $75; 1,000 pounds, $100; 1,500 pounds, $125; 2,000 pounds, $150; 3,500 pounds, $175; 5,000 pounds, $200, and $25 additional for every additional 2,000 pounds; the average weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than thirty, at such times after June 30, 1873, and not less frequently than once in every four years, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct. (Act of March 3, 1873.)

No pay is allowed for apartments or space in baggage cars.

Mr. MURDOCK. I realize how carefully the gentleman has gone into this subject, and for information I should like to know if he has found out any reason why we should pay $25 per year for a 40-foot car and $50 per year, or double that amount, for a 55-foot car—namely, an increase of 15 feet in length, while we double the pay.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think there is any good reason. I think that the adjustment of railway mail pay is in that particular defective, and I say, further, I see no reason, if they pay $50 per mile per year for a 55-foot car, why they should not pay something for the compartment on a light route, where the Government does not pay a cent except for the weight and where the pay is very much less in proportion to the cost of the service. However, I mention this to show you that in allowing extra pay per mile for R. P. O. cars we are paying the railroad companies for furnishing that space, and when we have paid it once I believe that is enough. Now, there are two kinds of pay, as we have seen so far: On a route that carries no R. P. O. cars, where they either carry the mail in the baggage car or have it in a compartment, there is no pay except the weight pay—the ton-mile pay. Where they furnish these palatial so-called "R. P. O. cars," there is this other pay that I have referred to.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. In the case of the R. P. O. car we are now paying both for the use of the car and per ton besides, are we not?

Mr. STEENERSON. We certainly are.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Do you think that is right?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will explain to you why I think it ought to be changed; but I think the principle is correct, and that is all I am discussing now. When, for the dispatch of the mail, we require a large car, weighing ten times or twenty times as much as the load it carries, I think we ought to allow extra pay for doing that, and we have done it amply in the R. P. O. car pay.

But in addition to this, on one route from Washington to New Orleans we also allow $142,000 extra. That is extra pay in addition to these two kinds of pay that I have mentioned, and on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe between Kansas City, Mo., and Newton, Kans., we allow $25,000 a year for the same purpose; so those two lines are getting three kinds of pay—three times over again, so to speak—whereas the other railroads in the country—the stepchildren, if I may so call them—only get one kind of pay, to wit, the per ton per mile rate.

Now, when we understand the principles upon which the law of 1873 was framed, I think we can also understand its limitations. The law of 1873 as amended (and, of course, the amendments cut no figure except that they reduce horizontally the amount of pay) was based upon this principle, that if you increase the density of the traffic you must decrease the compensation. It is based upon the well-known economic law of increasing returns. I believe the economists lay down the principle. There is a law of increasing returns, a law of constant returns, and a law of decreasing returns—that is to say, where you have a certain amount of fixed capital invested in any kind of business you may increase the business without increasing the expenses materially, and therefore you have increased returns. For instance——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the total amount paid annually by the Government of the United States for the transportation of the mails?

Mr. STEENERSON. We have not got the figures for 1906, because we have not paid it all out yet. It will end next June.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was the amount for the previous year?

Mr. STEENERSON. I can tell you the amount for 1905. The railway mail pay was $39,384,916, but if we include the R. P. O. pay and the special facilities pay it was $45,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The appropriation was $39,000,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; it was $39,000,000 without counting the R. P. O. pay and without counting the special facilities pay. To be exact, the expenditure for railway transportation of mail was $39,384,916.17. For R. P. O. cars it was $5,509,044.65.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit one more question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Thirty-nine million dollars represents 5 per cent on $780,000,000. Now——

Mr. STEENERSON. I decline to yield for the purpose of computation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; but does not the gentleman think it would be better for the United States to build and own its own postal cars and pay the railroads for hauling them? Would it not be more economical? I cite these figures to show the proper force of this question. Thirty-nine million dollars is 5 per cent on $780,000,000. It would not cost anywhere near that to make the postal cars that we need.

Mr. STEENERSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That question does not have any bearing upon what I was saying.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Suppose the United States was to build and own the postal cars; we could get them for very much less than the $45,000,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will state to the gentleman, with all due respect, that he is on the wrong track if he wants to reduce the cost of transporting the mail in that way, because if the Government owned the cars it would be more expensive than it is now. The way to reduce the cost of transportation is not in Government ownership of mail cars, unless the Government owns the railroads as well, in my opinion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to go on and explain the principle upon which the law is founded. I said that this law of increased returns could be well illustrated with a man having a hotel and running a bus. If he only carries one passenger from the depot to the hotel, it costs just as much as if he carries ten. The wear and tear on the tugs and the cost of axle grease would amount to but very little, but if he increased that load so as to fill his bus it may be that there is a limit. As long as he increases it to a proper load the law of increased returns without further investment applies. But the minute he increases the load so much that the horses have to stop and rest and it takes a longer time and it comes to be better that he have two rigs to carry the load, then he reaches the limit of the law of constant returns; and if he breaks down by too heavy loading, he soon reaches the law of decreased returns, so it would be better to furnish a new rig.

Now, the underlying principle of this law of 1873 is based upon this economic law, which has more application to transportation than to any other business. Congress sought to do justice in this regard. You will observe that under this law of 1873 the rate per pound per mile is twenty times greater where the weight of the mail is 200 pounds and under, and that the lowest rate is only 5.8 per ton per mile where it is over 5,000 pounds. But you will observe, gentlemen, that under this table the operation of this law stops at 5,000 pounds, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] suggested a while ago.

Now, is there any reason for that? None has ever been discovered. If the law of constant returns could be arrived at or reached at 5,000 pounds, then there would be reason for stopping there; but even a novice in the principles governing the business of transportation will know that it is cheaper to carry 10,000 pounds in a load on a train, proportionately, than 5,000 pounds, and that you can not carry on an ordinary train even in postal cars 20,000 pounds without materially decreasing the expense of transportation. So that the defect in the law of 1873 is not that it allows too much pay for the light route, like the one in Michigan I referred to, but that it allows no reduction where the tonnage is heaviest, where the density of the traffic is great.

Now, I desire to follow this up with a brief reference to the so-called Postal Commission of 1898. That Commission was created by statute and was composed of members of the Senate and House. They asked for an extension of time; they took testimony all over the United States and sent one man to Europe to investigate postal conditions. They printed their testimony in three volumes; they employed Professor Adams, an expert, who rendered a very able report. Then they came to this conclusion—the majority of them joined in that report—that "we conclude that the charges for railway mail transportation are not excessive," and that is all that it amounted to; that they were not excessive. They never discussed the question as to whether or not it was fair to the light routes, fair or sufficient to the road where the density of traffic was greatest. They never sought to consider the question of equality of compensation in proportion to the cost of the service.

One of the gentlemen, a member of that Commission, was Mr. Moody, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts in this House, the present Attorney-General of the United States. He made a separate report, and I want to call the attention of the House to that report so far as it concerns the crucial question in this case. It should be remembered that the railway accountants and experts had testified quite universally that the maximum load upon the R. P. O. cars was 2 tons, or 4,000 pounds, and that the dead weight was even more than was compensated for by the R. P. O. special pay, and that therefore it could not be reduced. Now, the Department officials testified that 3½ tons was an easy load for an R. P. O. on an average, and that they have loaded as high as 5 tons. It further appears in testimony, which was ignored by that Commission, that some mail was carried on storage cars in these routes where the mail was carried by special train. Now, Professor Adams, after having spent months in figuring out the cost of the service, comparing it with freight traffic, with passenger traffic, and with express traffic, came to this conclusion: that if the load could be increased or actually had increased—that is, the average—then the pay on the dense routes was too much. I would say that the gentleman who made another report, Mr. Loud, went off on an idea of his own about discarding weight pay entirely and paying for space, and as that is so unusual an idea and confined to himself, so far as I know, it is not necessary to pay any attention to it. It would result in having large cars with nothing in them.

I desire to read somewhat from the report of Mr. Moody. You will observe that the report made by Mr. Moody reviews the evidence of Mr. Adams and he says that the whole question turns upon the size of the load, so that under the operation of the economic law of transportation of increasing returns they carry it very much cheaper if they carry 3½ tons per car than if they carry 2 tons per car.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. Right in that connection, does not the gentleman think that it is a matter of administration in the hands of the Department if the loads are lighter than they should be?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; not at all. The gentleman is entirely mistaken, as I shall show in a little while. The Department does not control the load.

Mr. FINLEY. Would it not control it in this sense, in providing more in the way of R. P. O. lines than was necessary?

Mr. STEENERSON. They never get any more R. P. O. cars than they need, because that question has to do with the dispatch of the mail, and the American people desire to have their mail fast. The dispatch of the mail is the controlling question.

Mr. FINLEY. If an R. P. O. car is only half loaded—has half as much mail as it should carry—then does not that increase the cost and expense to the Government?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I should say not; not railway mail pay. I desire now to read an extract from the report of Mr. Moody, and I ought to say first that Mr. Adams recommended a reduction in railway mail pay under the law of 1873. It is as follows:

Some attention must now be directed to the report of Mr. Adams, and the recommendations which it contains. The existing law prescribing railway mail pay automatically lowers the rate on any given route as the volume of traffic increases. Mr. Adams shows that by the normal effect of this law the rate per ton per mile is $1.17 when the average daily weight of mail is 200 pounds, and, decreasing with the increase of volume, it becomes 6.073 cents when the average daily weight is 300,000 pounds. Under the operations of this law the average rate per ton per mile has decreased from 26.42 cents in 1873 to 12.567 cents in 1898. Beginning with 1880, the first year in which all the statistics are available for comparison, passenger rates have decreased 21 per cent, freight rates 44 per cent, and mail rates 39 per cent. This would seem satisfactory were it not for the facts that during the same period the passenger mileage of passengers increased 233 per cent, the ton mileage of freight 353 per cent, and the ton mileage of mail 579 per cent, and that there had resulted large concentrations of mail on certain routes.

Applying to these facts the fundamental law of transportation, that the cost per unit of transportation decreases as the density of the traffic increases, Mr. Adams declares that they indicate that there should have been a decidedly greater fall in mail than in passenger or freight rates. He is led at once to the inquiry whether the rates upon the routes where there is the greatest concentration of mail are not excessive. The rule of transportation invoked is based upon the assumption that the increase of traffic permits the introduction of increased economy, and notably the economy which results in so loading cars that the ratio of dead weight to paying freight is decreased.

Yet this economy is precisely what our method of transporting mail denies to the railroads. Instead of permitting the mail cars, whether apartment or full postal cars, to be loaded to their full capacity, the Government demands that the cars shall be lightly loaded, so that there may be ample space for the sorting and distribution of mail en route. In other words, instead of a freight car, we exact a traveling post-office. The modern 60-foot postal car weighs from 80,000 to 100,000 pounds. It is clear that if but 2 tons of mail are carried upon it, all the economies which result from densities of traffic upon the route are lost. This is true, although the extra pay for running the postal car is about equal to the pay for a ton of mail.

Mr. Adams recognizes clearly the effect of these facts working against the normal operation of the fundamental law of transportation under consideration. He is apparently of the opinion that if the facts are as they are claimed to be, namely, that on an average but 2 tons of mail are loaded on a postal car, and apartment cars are loaded in like proportion, the pay ought not to be reduced. Nevertheless, with this concession, he recommends a reduction of pay on the dense routes by extending the principles of the existing law, so that all routes carrying in excess of 5,000 pounds per day shall be subjected to a progressive reduction of from 1 to 12 per cent. This would effect a saving of something over a million dollars per annum. It has been suggested that there is an inconsistency between the opinion and the recommendation. I am anxious not to misrepresent Mr. Adams's views and conscious that I may do so. But, as I understand them, there is no inconsistency. He makes the recommendation in spite of the opinion, because he is unwilling to accept without further inquiry the hypothesis in respect to the loading of cars which has been pressed upon us. He is also unwilling to accept without further inquiry the present method of loading as a finality.

Now, if the Chairman pleases, the whole turning point is here. If the load of the R. P. O. car or carload was as estimated by the railway officials, then the pay is not too great. Now, I desire to read from Mr. Adams's figures as to the result.

He compares the express and mail business on the New York Central between New York and Buffalo, a distance of 439 miles, with the following results:

Railway charge for a ton of mail	$31.73
Railway charge for a ton of express	12.50
Railway charge for 100 pounds of mail	1.586
Railway charge for 100 pounds of express	.625
Railway charge per ton per mile for mail	.0723
Railway charge per ton per mile for express	.0285
Railway earnings per annum for 125 tons of mail daily	1,447,840.41
Railway earnings per annum for 125 tons of express daily	570,312.50
Railway earnings per annum per mile of line for 125 tons of mail daily	3,298.04
Railway earnings per annum per mile of line from 125 tons of express daily	1,299.12

My judgment is that the application of the statute of 1873 to the present conditions under which mail is carried results in overpayment upon the dense routes.

This conclusion is reached by a comparison of mail compensation upon any route exceeding 150 or 200 miles with railway compensation for carrying express matter or first-class freight.

In this comparison the railway has been allowed 50 per cent of the total charge for express instead of 40 per cent, which is the contract rate. It is further shown in the report that the Pennsylvania Railroad carried daily an average weight per mile of 300,000 pounds of mail, or 150 tons, and received an annual compensation of $3,422 per mile of line. The question arises, Can the Pennsylvania Railroad afford to carry the mail between New York and Philadelphia for less than $3,422 per mile of line, or $93.75 per mile of line per day? The answer depends primarily upon the manner in which the freight is to be moved. If we assume that this mail is to be carried by postal cars, with about 2 tons in each, it is doubtful if the railroad could afford to render the services more cheaply; but, on the other hand, should the cars be loaded with, let us say, 3½ tons of mail, the railroad company operates on a margin of profit that warrants a reduction of pay. The calculation upon which the above conclusions rest is as follows: At 2 tons per car, 150 tons of mail demand that seventy-eight cars be passed over each mile of this route daily. Seventy-eight cars would make eight trains.

"The average cost per train mile, all operating expenses being taken into account on all trains, is a little under $1, but we will call it $1. The New York Central gives the rate per passenger train per mile at 73 cents. This would make $8 per mile per day chargeable to operating expenses. If to this were added 33 per cent for fixed charges and dividends, improvements chargeable to income, investments and the like, we should have $10.40 per mile, which multiplied by 365 would give us $3,796 per mile per year from mail service. This you will notice is in excess of the amount which this route actually receives. If now the assumption be changed and each car be loaded with 3½ tons instead of 2 tons of mail, a similar computation shows by the rate we expend for this mail service an annual sum per mile of line of $2,427.25. Were it possible to load 5 tons to a car the expense would be $1,533 per mile of line."

A careful examination of the testimony produced before the Postal Commission, as well as of Professor Adams and the other witnesses, including Department officials, does not justify the conclusion that the maximum load of mail in a postal car is only 2 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. May I ask my colleague if he would like a few minutes more?

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield fifteen minutes more time to the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. I thank you. Now, the Department officials testified before the Postal Commission that the load of 3½ tons was an easy load, and Mr. Adams was aware that experts of the railroads testified it was 2 tons, and the Postal Commission decided, I presume on the weight of the evidence, that it was 2 tons, and Mr. Moody, in this report I have read, agreed that there ought to be further inquiry on that point, as Mr. Adams recommended, and agreed that a further investigation of that question should be made. We took pains before the Post-Office Committee to inquire as to the load, but we got no special satisfaction out of the Department officials. They stated before the Post-Office Committee that the weights and loads were not kept separately and they would try to furnish the information later, but it does not appear in the bound copy here.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman, has the Post-Office Committee sought to carry out the recommendations of the Commission to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. STEENERSON. I should say Congress had sought to carry out the recommendations of the Commission, because the Commission recommended that nothing be done. They said the railway mail pay was not excessive.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. You do not claim that by the various reports.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is not unanimous, but it is the report of the majority of the Postal Commission, with only one member reporting in favor of a reduction. I say the evidence before them would have justified, if not required, a report that the pay upon the dense route was excessive, and they should have made a recommendation that it should be reduced. I think the evidence now before us justifies us in amending the law, as I shall suggest. Now, I was so anxious to have this House understand this point that I sent down to the Post-Office Department and asked them, since they had not furnished the committee with the information they promised, if they would not from the weigh sheets give us the information on that point as to what the load in the postal car was, and I got a letter yesterday from the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, which I desire to have the Clerk read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
Washington, April 4, 1906.

Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your several inquiries in regard to the relative weight of mails carried in storage cars and distributing cars on exclusive mail trains, I regret that we can not give you just the information you call for, because in weighing mails we have never kept the weight carried in a storage car separate and apart from that carried in a distributing car on the same train, nor would it be practicable, as mail is being constantly shifted from one car to another in the process of distribution.

Taking all of the trains that carry storage cars as well as distributing cars on what might be termed "exclusive mail trains"—although that term is to some extent a misnomer, because there are probably not more than two or three trains in the country that are made up exclusively of mail cars, there being usually one or more express or baggage cars, or possibly a passenger car or sleeper—we find that on such trains we have forty-eight distributing cars as against twenty-six storage cars. The weight of mail carried in storage cars, as well as in distributing cars, fluctuates very much. We recently had a report showing that 47,000 pounds was carried in a storage car, but the average weight will probably run from 20,000 to 30,000 pounds. The average amount carried in a distributing car will probably run from 5,000 to 8,000 pounds.

On the transcontinental trains, as well as all other through trains, the mail in the storage car does not, as a rule, go through intact from one end to the other. It is usually distributed en route, the undistributed mail being taken from the storage car into the distributing car to be worked, its place in the storage car being taken by through mail that has already been distributed.

Very respectfully,
W. S. SHALLENBERGER,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, it will be seen that the question of the load is materially affected by whether or not they are carrying mail on storage cars, because a storage car's ordinary capacity is 45,000 pounds, or 22½ tons. If they carry two storage cars and three R. P. O. cars in a train, the average carload would be increased to at least 5 tons instead of 3½ tons, which would justify a reduction on such a route of more than 50 per cent on railway mail pay. If we assume that this mail is to be carried in postal cars of about 2 tons each it is doubtful if the railroad could afford to render the service any more cheaply. On the other hand, should the cars be loaded, let us say, with 3½ tons as an average load, the railway company operates on a margin of profit of more than 100 per cent, and that warrants a reduction in pay.

Mr. SMALL. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. I understand the gentleman to say that in his opinion the charges for railroad transportation are not excessive upon small roads or where the amount of mail matter carried is comparatively small in quantity?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not think it is excessive on light routes where they carry mail in apartment cars and baggage cars, but excessive where they have special mail trains, and I can prove it.

Mr. SMALL. Where the amount of mail carried is large in quantity?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; it is all regulated by the density.

Mr. SMALL. The remedy you have would be in a horizontal reduction in rates?

Mr. STEENERSON. No, sir.

Mr. SMALL. Then what remedy has the gentleman to offer?

Mr. STEENERSON. The remedy is, instead of stopping reduction at the 5,000 pounds, as is now the law, I would carry on the reduction to the load of 15,000, 20,000, 60,000, 150,000, and 300,000 pounds. If you extend the operation of this law so that the pay is reduced as weight increases, in proportion to the increase in the density of traffic, you will arrive at a just rate for carrying the mail. Professor Adams recognized this, and pointed it out in his report as follows:

> In the appendix to this report will be found a computation showing the normal effect of the law of 1873, as influenced by a constantly increasing amount of mail traffic. It begins with an average daily weight of mail of 200 pounds, which is the smallest amount specifically provided for in the law, and carries the computation to an average daily weight of 300,000, which is a little less than the weight carried in the railway mail system as at present operated. The summary shows the rate per ton per mile, as also the pay per mile of route per annum, for a series of assumed weights between the two extremes named. Thus the rate per ton per mile, for a mail route with an average daily weight of 200 pounds, is $1.17; the rate per ton per mile of mail for a mail route with an average daily weight of 300,000 pounds is 6.073. These weights, it should be remembered, are exclusive of the amount charged as payment for postal cars. The pay per mile of route per annum over a road carrying 200 pounds of mail daily is $42.75. The pay per mile per annum over a route carrying 300,000 pounds daily is $3,325.12. These statements indicate the broad margin over which the law operates. This summary is of great assistance in the study of the problem of railway mail pay, because it shows at a glance the rate per ton per mile paid, as well as the pay per mile of route, for any assumed weight. The actual rate paid under the law can never drop below $5.856, no matter how great an increase in the weight of the mail carried. The curve of pay under the law on the diagram will be found in the appendix, and is a parabolic curve; it ever approaches but can never reach the base of rate. To criticise the law before ascertaining the conditions under which it works will be premature, but it may be remarked that the above statement of the law prepares one for the conclusion that it too quickly reaches the limit of any practicable reduction of the rate for increase in the volume of traffic. It may have fitted well into the conditions which existed in 1873, but it needs to be revised in order to properly adjust itself to the conditions of the present time.

NOTE.—The average weights and amounts of pay per mile per annum in italic figures are explicitly prescribed in the laws mentioned; the others are computed from these according to the weights prescribed by the Postmaster-General as warranting the addition of $1 to the annual pay per mile, these weights being 12 pounds where the daily average weight of mail is between 200 and 500 pounds, 20 pounds where the daily average weight of mail is between 500 and 1,000 pounds, 20 pounds where the daily average weight of mail is between 1,000 and 1,500 pounds, 20 pounds where the daily average weight of mail is between 1,500 and 2,000 pounds, 60 pounds where the daily average weight of mail is between 2,000 and 3,500 pounds, 60 pounds where the daily average weight of mail is between 3,500 and 5,000 pounds, 80 pounds where the daily average weight of mail is above 5,000 pounds. Amounts not warranting the addition of an entire dollar are neglected.

The laws prescribe that for each additional 2,000 pounds above 5,000 pounds there shall be paid $21.37½ per mile of route per annum.

I have already referred to the report of the Postal Commission on the general subject of railway mail pay, but the report also considers special-facility pay, and six out of eight members of that Commission, including Senators WOLCOTT, ALLISON, and Chandler and Representatives Moody, Loud, and Fleming, are unanimously opposed to special-facility pay and recommend its discontinuance. Senator MARTIN and ex-Representative Catchings disagree upon the ground that there was discretion in the Postmaster-General to expend it or not, but they do not attempt to justify it. Postmaster-General Wanamaker, as long as November 30, 1891, declined to include this in his budget for the following year, the reason given being that such an appropriation was not necessary and created dissatisfaction upon the part of other roads not receiving the benefits. Again on February 25, 1892, Postmaster-General Wanamaker, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, stated:

> The continuance of special-facility allowance has for some years past been a source of much annoyance to the Department, and has hampered the best interests of the mail service, because railroads operating in contiguous territory, and to some extent paralleling the roads which receive the extra pay, object to rendering equally good or quicker schedule mail service except they be paid corresponding rates.

Since that time no Postmaster-General, so far as I can find, has recommended this item. The present Postmaster-General, on page 9 of his annual report for this year, recommends against this item. He says:

Curtailment has been recommended wherever possible, and many decreases are shown, of which the following are examples: Railway transportation, special facilities, $167,728.25.

At the hearing before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads General Shallenberger testified:

That this line from Washington to New Orleans, including the Southern Railway, the Western Railway of Alabama, and the Louisville and Nashville, received $1,003,940.09 for transportation, $223,947 for R. P. O. cars, and $142,728 subsidy, less certain deductions amounting to $33,861.31.

Then he was asked these questions:

Q. Do you want this money or not?
A. We are not asking it nor expressing an opinion in reference to it.
Q. What is the reason that you all are silent on that question?
A. We are not silent.
Q. You say you do not ask it?
A. We do not estimate for it.
Q. And what is the reason you do not ask it?
A. Because we think that the effect upon the service or route is better if we do not select any particular route in any particular section for special favors.
Q. Then you do not select it because you think it is a bad example and that it affects the railway mail service elsewhere by giving this subsidy?
A. That is the situation.
Q. So you think that for the good of the service the thing ought not to be done, taking the country at large?
A. I think that for the good of the service at large that no special favors should be given to any one particular road or system.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], as well as other gentlemen, have asked me what my remedy is. My answer is: The post-office establishment of the United States is a business institution engaged in transportation, and is subject to the recognized economic laws governing that business. Uncle Sam has a large "plant," if we may so call it. He has 68,000 postmasters, 30,000 city carriers, 35,000 rural carriers, 13,200 railway mail clerks, and other employees in the postal service, making a grand total of 280,000. He has millions of dollars invested in buildings and equipment. He could probably increase his business without incurring a proportionate increase in expenditures even under the law governing railway pay as it now is, but he certainly could do so if it was modified as suggested by Professor Adams, and as seems to be justified by the changed conditions relative to size of load now carried on special mail trains. Should we simplify the classification of mail and consolidate third and fourth class matter, as recommended by the Postmaster-General, I believe it would result in very largely increasing our business and lowering our proportionate expenditures. I do not believe you would make anything by raising the rate on second-class matter. It is carried at a loss, it is true. Mr. Newcomb's book on the Postal Deficit gives his figures as to the distance at which mail of the different classes is carried at a loss. He points out that at 2 cents an ounce the rate per ton is $640, regardless of distance. If we pay 35 per cent of this for transportation, it will be $224, and divide this by 12.567 cents, the average rate at that time, gives 1,782 miles as the maximum distance it can be carried without loss. But he further contends that the postage actually received averages 85.6 cents per pound for first class, because of the fact that nearly all letters weigh much less than 2 ounces, so that first-class mail can actually be carried 4,768 miles without expending more than 35 per cent of the receipts.

The table is as follows:

	As given by Professor Adams.	The correct figures.
	Miles.	Miles.
For first-class mail	1,782	4,768
For second-class mail	56	45
For third-class mail	446	819
For fourth-class mail (ordinary)	891	947
For fourth-class (seed, etc.)	----------	512
For foreign mail	----------	2,562
For postal cards	----------	10,483

Now, if we actually receive $1,712 for every ton of first-class mail, that is certainly a very profitable part of our business. It is the policy of all engaged in the management of transportation enterprises to recognize public necessity, as it is called. The railway manager first determines how much revenue is required to pay operating expenses, interest on bonds, and dividend. Then he distributes this burden upon the different items or classifications of traffic as may best be able to bear it. The cheap coal, which is a necessity to the development of the region he serves, but which is very bulky, he must carry cheaply, even at a slight loss; but the silks, jewelry, clothing, and similar goods of high value must pay a larger share and a large profit. It costs nearly as much to move a ton of coal as a ton of silk, but if the prices were the same there would be no business, and the railroad would be worthless.

The development of the country and prosperity of its people is so closely identified with the prosperity of the transportation company that it is often said they must go up and down together. So it is wtih the business of the postal service. Primarily, it was established for the transmission and distribution of intelligence among the people. To raise the rate on second-class mail would be an additional tax on such distribution, and, as the diffusion of intelligence is a fundamental condition of the social well-being and industrial development and evolution of the people, it would seem to be an unwise thing to do. Not only would it be unwise from the viewpoint of public welfare, but it might result in actual business loss to the postal service. A newspaper or magazine may be carried at a loss of a cent or two, but if that same newspaper or magazine brings into the mail two or three or a hundred letters, paying us at the rate of 85 cents per pound, the loss is many times made up. If the result should be that fewer such periodicals would circulate, and there would be a corresponding loss in first-class mail, the raising of second-class rates would not even be good business policy. So I came to the conclusion that the remedy lies in amending the law of 1873 so as to extend the gradual reduction of rates in proportion to increased density beyond the 5,000-pound limit, and then, by revising our rates and classification, seeking to increase the business of the postal service and its usefulness to the people. That is my remedy. If I should offer such an amendment, it is liable to be ruled out on a point of order. I hope no such point will be made. But I must return, before concluding, to this item of special-facility pay, which we may strike out without conflicting with the rules.

I went down and looked at that train on the Southern Railway, which starts from Washington at 8 a. m., last Monday. While it was quite an effort to be up as early as 8 o'clock, we have had so many conflicting statements about it that I thought I would go and see for myself. That train on Monday was composed of three R. P. O. cars and one storage car and one express car.

Mr. JOHNSON. What do you mean by a storage car?

Mr. STEENERSON. A 60-foot car that is filled with mail sacks. Its capacity is 45,000 pounds—22½ tons. Everything about it is the same as a freight car, and no difference whatever between a freight car carrying freight and a freight storage car full of mail, except that it moves in this mail train. I asked the man in charge of that train—I will say right here they treated me most politely, for I believe they took me for the president of the Southern Railroad. [Laughter.] They told me that Monday was the lightest day for mail, and that on other days of the week they had two storage cars in that train, three R. P. O. cars, and an express car. Until it reaches Atlanta it carries no passengers, but when it reaches Atlanta passenger cars are attached, and instead of running 42 miles an hour it comes down to 35 miles, the ordinary speed for a passenger train. Now, then, that condition of the mails, with 40,000 pounds in the two storage cars and 10 tons in the three R. P. O. cars, makes 60,000 pounds in the three cars—30 tons of mail. They probably had 50 tons including the express car. Assuming that they get the lowest price—which is not correct; but I will assume now they get the price on the densest route, 6 cents per ton per mile—if they had 50 tons they get $3 per train mile, whereas the cost of operating a railroad train of that class was $1. If, therefore, the Southern Railroad carries mail from Washington to New Orelans in storage cars and R. P. O. cars, with an average load of 10 tons per car in the train, they receive in weight pay alone three times what it costs to run it.

But that is not all. We pay them for the special facilities, and for the R. P. O. cars besides, and the reason for this is they say that it traverses a sparsely settled country. They say that it traverses the new and undeveloped pioneer States, where the settlers are living, I suppose, in shacks upon the prairies; such new and undeveloped States as Virginia, such young Commonwealths as the magnificent State of Tennessee, which produces such splendid specimens of manhood as my friend Judge Moon. It traverses the State of South Carolina, the State of North Carolina, the State of Alabama, the States of Georgia and Louisiana. These, they claim, are new, sparsely settled States, and are therefore entitled to special favors.

It will be observed, if you look upon the map of the United States, that that route parallels the Atlantic coast; that there are several other railway lines in the same direction, only a few miles apart. There is the Seaboard Air Line, there is the Atlantic Coast Line, there is a railroad traversing almost every part of that country, and yet they say that because the conditions are different in the oldest and most prosperous sections of the United States, therefore we, out on the praries, in Dakota and Montana and Washington, where the snows are deep in the winter and the weather is cold, and the difficulty of operating railroads is great—that we ought to be content with ordinary mail pay, where the traffic is light, but that there, in the garden spot of the world, it must be subsidized. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I regret very much that I can not have a little time for a peroration.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman want three minutes?

Mr. STEENERSON. Thank you, I would like to have it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will take the time to accommodate my friend from South Carolina.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman spoke about this being a sparsely settled community through which this railroad runs from Washington to New Orleans. I should like to ask him this: Does he think the fact that the Southern Railway is double-tracking its line from Washington to Atlanta, Ga., is any proof of the fact that it is a sparsely settled community?

Mr. STEENERSON. Judging by the reasoning that underlies this appropriation, I think that should be considered a signal of distress. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But we are giving them a big subsidy all the same.

Mr. MEYER. Will you yield to me for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, is not the gentleman aware of the fact that some years ago the Seaboard Air Line had this contract to carry this fast mail, and gave it up because they found it was not remunerative and they could not afford to do it?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am not aware of what any other railroad did, but I am aware of the fact that the most profitable business that the Southern Railway has or ever will have is the carrying of that special train of mail loaded in storage cars. [Applause.]

I should like to say to my friend from South Carolina that I rejoice in the development of the South. There is not a man upon the Republican side or in the Northern States who has not taken the greatest pride in the wonderful development of the Southern States in the last few years. We all have read of the New South, and we all have seen the magnificent Representatives that the New South is sending to this House, and we are glad of it. [Applause.] We rejoice in your good fortune, for in no part of the United States has that infallible evidence of prosperity, the transportation of the mail, shown such an increase and such advancement as in the Southern States.

It has increased most wonderfully in those very States, and there is no section of the country where the development has been so uniform and so continuous in the last decade. And there is no part of the United States where a mail subsidy is so little needed. [Applause.] I will say right here that it is not needed anywhere, because, even if the railway mail pay is not sufficient to be compensatory, the public necessity requires all railroad companies for the common benefit to carry it. They are interested in the development of their own territory, and they will carry it at the rate of pay that we prescribe.

But, I say, let us extend the operation of the law of 1873 in principle beyond 5,000 pounds, and strike out the subsidy outrage, and we will have a just, fair compensation to the railroads, and the American people will be satisfied. [Loud applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEDGE], a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, has prepared an argument upon the subject of railway mail pay. I have the manuscript of his speech. The gentleman was suddenly called to his home by the death of a son. I ask unanimous consent that his speech, the manuscript which I now have in my hand, may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEDGE. What is the railroad mail pay? The railroad mail pay is not a matter of guess. The present law was the result of careful scientific study of the subject by able and honest officials of the Post-Office Department, acting in the interest of the Government. It was adopted in 1873 in place of the haphazard system of 1845, which was full of discretions, under which railroads were paid by favor largely and without much regard to the services rendered. The system of 1873 was devised by these Department officials, as the record shows, without any conferences with or cooperation of the railroads, and was criticised and opposed by the railroads almost from the beginning, especially regarding the pay allowed for providing and hauling post-office cars, which contemporary correspondence shows clearly.

The system for paying railroads for carrying the mails is based chiefly upon weight, and any consideration of the subject will show that weight ought to be the basis if the Government is to have adequate protection in the matter. The space occupied in the cars by the mails, as the system has developed, is a predominent element, it is true, but to pay for it as space, measured as space, would introduce an element of discretion and uncertainty which might result very unfavorably to the Government. Comparing the space now required and used in all cars for the mails with the space used and occupied on passenger trains by express matter and by passengers, it would be easy to evolve a schedule based upon "space" under which the present pay to railroads would be doubled for the same service they now perform. Nobody wants to take the risks of that. The payment for furnishing and hauling post-office cars is partly a recognition of space, but is more in the nature of compensation for providing a great convenience, the traveling post-office, at a low haulage rate of 5 cents per car mile hauled. It is undoubtedly true that, as a matter of principle and consistency, apartment cars ought to be specially compensated for in addition to the weight payment, but they are not.

THE WEIGHT PAYMENT.

The payment to railroads for weight of mails carried was established upon a graduated scale, which must be accurately understood in order to determine its merits. It recognizes two extremes, and if these are clearly kept in mind it is easy enough to know the rate of payment for all routes and all classes of the business.

MAIL PAYMENT ON THE SMALL ROUTES.

The pay begins with 200 pounds. It is measured over what are called "routes." These routes vary in length from 6 to 400 miles. The Post-Office Department establishes a route—that is, determines between what two stations upon a railroad it will establish a mail route. Then, if the business upon a route is very small, it falls in the lowest class, namely, the route carrying 200 pounds or less of mail a round trip over the line each day. The pay over such a route was originally fixed at $50 per mile of railroad per year.

Suppose that the route is 10 miles long, the pay for that service would, of course, be $500 per year, and a round trip for 365 days being 730 trips yearly, the compensation of that road would be 68½ cents per trip under the original law. But this has been twice reduced by Congress, so that, instead of $50 per mile, it is now $42.75, which for 10 miles is $427.50 per year, or 58½ cents per trip. If there is one intermediate town on this route, and therefore three towns are served with mail, the pay of this railroad is 19½ cents per town. If there should be two trains each way over that route, and therefore four mails daily, the pay would be 9¾ cents for each mail service at each town, and so on, depending upon the number of times each day the mail is served at that town. There are hundreds of these small routes—carrying 200 pounds or less—where the pay ranges from 3 to 8 cents per mile of service, and from 15 to 20 cents per town served daily with mail, and from 9 to 17 cents for each complete delivery of a pouch, or two pouches of mail from train to post-office, depending altogether upon the number of deliveries each day. On some small routes there are six deliveries. Now, what is this service worth? Upon these small routes, on the average, it costs the Government less than 4 cents per mile of service. The cost of the star route is officially reported as 6.5 cents per mile of service and rural free delivery costs 10.6 cents per mile of service. But the cost "per ton" and "per pound" on these small routes as upon star routes and rural free-delivery routes sounds very high. Carrying 200 pounds daily is, of course, 36½ tons yearly, and the pay being $42.75 per mile per year, we pay, therefore, on the small routes $1.17 per ton per mile, compared with only 6 and 7 cents per ton per mile on the heavy routes. But no one would think of estimating the value of the star route or rural free service at so much per ton or per ton per mile. It is a question of service, requiring a man's time, his team, and equipment to handle a very small weight of mail. It is not weight, but service. In the same manner, the service upon all the small railroad routes should be considered. The railroad companies furnish a railroad; they assume responsibility for each pound of mail; it is registered or receipted for by each man who handles it; the messenger service, in many cases, exceeds the entire pay. It is a quicker service and in every respect a more satisfactory service for the Government than is performed by either the star route or the rural free, and the cost to the Government per mile of service rendered is about one-half that paid in either of the other branches.

MAIL PAY ON HEAVY ROUTES.

Now, go to the other extreme of the railroad mail pay—the heavy routes. These heavy routes all carry over 5,000 pounds daily; some of them over 300,000 pounds daily. The rate fixed by law for every pound in excess of 5,000 is $21.37 per ton (carried daily) per mile of railroad. It was originally $25 per ton, and has been reduced first 10 per cent and then 5 per cent, making it now $21.37, which for 365 tons is a rate of 5.85 cents per ton per mile. The small routes are paid at the rate of $1.17 per ton per mile, and the heavy routes are paid at the rate of 5.85 cents per ton per mile, or one-twentieth as much. Are the heavy routes paid excessively? If the rate established in this law for railroad mail pay upon the small routes seems reasonable, then is a rate that is one-twentieth as great upon the heavy routes an excessive rate? Some things seem to be clear enough in this matter.

One is that there is no other department of the railroad service in which there is so enormous a drop in the rate from a retail to wholesale transaction as in this mail rate. Indeed, it is held by many that the large shipper—the shipper in large quantities—should never be entitled to a lower rate than the small shipper. Assuming that the rate paid by the Government over small mail routes is reasonable, as it appears to be, considering the actual service and compared with the cost of star route and rural free-delivery service, the fall in the rate per ton from $1.17 on small routes to 5.85 cents per ton on large routes is certainly without parallel in any other class of railroad service or in any other service performed for the Government. It is a most drastic application of the principle of lower rates for wholesale quantities.

It also seems plain that statements of the "average rate" per ton per mile, arrived at by merely taking a large number of small mail routes with light weights, paid at the rate of $1.17 per ton per mile, to lump together with a small number of heavy routes, carrying three-fourths to four-fifths of all the mail in the country at 6 or 7 cents per ton per mile, is apt to be very misleading.

But comparisons are constantly being made in this manner. An illustration appears in a discredited book entitled "Cowles' Freight and Passenger Post," and I refer to it because this particular illustration has been frequently used in debates upon this subject. It undertakes to quote a nominal 100 pound express rate between New York and Chicago (980 miles) to compare with what is denominated in this book the "average rate" paid by the Government for carrying mails 442 miles—half the distance. Between New York and Chicago, both on express and mail, the rates are extremely low, the lowest in the country, but the mail rates are lower than express. The mail rate from New York to Chicago is $3.57 per 100, and the express earnings between the same cities on 7-pound packages (the typical express package) are $9.10 per 100, of which one-half goes to the railroad, or $4.55 per 100—that is to say, the railroad receives 20 per cent more from its express business between New York and Chicago than it receives from the Government for transporting the mails between the same points. But by plausibly comparing the express rate between New York and Chicago with a so-called "average rate" for 442 miles, which includes these hundreds of small routes over the whole country, it is made to appear that the mail rate is higher than the express rate, when the truth is just the other way.

The pouch service, the apartment-car service, the full postal-car service, and the fast mail service differ from each other so much in their cost to the railroad, in the manner of their performance by the railroad, and in their value to the railroad and to the Government that in determining whether the roads are overpaid or underpaid for carrying the mail each class should be studied by itself. In the pouch service there is some basis for comparing the price we pay to the railroad with the cost of the star route and rural free, but such basis disappears when it comes to the apartment-car service, because there the railroad furnishes often half a car and carries a messenger, but is only paid for the weight of a few pounds of mail. Nobody is to blame for these differences. They grow out of the proper conduct of the business. What I mean to say in this connection is that the question requires some knowledge and information and some exercise of judgment and some discrimination, particularly in matters of comparison of mail rates with express rates and passenger rates and freight rates. That is one reason why the views of newspaper and magazine writers picked up in an hour's reading possess little value, however much they may influence general public opinion.

There is no serious contention that there is overpayment on the small routes—the pouch service—but that the earnings of the railroads from carrying the heaviest mails are excessive.

Eighty-five per cent of all mail is carried in postal cars, either apartment or full postal cars. Upon every heavy route almost the entire weight of the mail is carried in postal cars, and upon the heaviest routes it is carried in special trains which transport nothing but mail. The railroad company does not perform any service for any other customer as it performs the apartment car, and the postal car, and the fast mail service for the Government. I shall make an attempt to candidly estimate the value of this claim of the postal service to us.

THE APARTMENT-CAR SERVICE.

It has been said that the Long Island Railroad (390 miles) is the poorest-paid railway in the United States for the work it performs in carrying the mails. This grows out of the great frequency of service on the line with light weight of mail, but chiefly because the mail is carried largely in apartment cars. The Post-Office Department asserts and exercises the right, whenever it considers the mail to be carried over any railroad route sufficient in amount and importance to require its distribution en route, or that the convenience of the public will be promoted by a distribution en route, to compel the railroad company, without compensation, to furnish half or three-quarters of a baggage car, or less, fitted up as a post-office, with space and facilities for a messenger to work in distributing the mails en route. We now have in this service 2,700 apartment cars. How may we fairly determine whether the earnings of the railroads from carriage over routes having apartment-car service are excessive or not? By knowing what the service is and what the pay is. This may best be learned by accurate knowledge regarding some typical route. In the RECORD a few days ago there were reproduced several columns of editorial matter from the Washington Post, relating to this subject, at the head of which appeared the following:

The little railroad running from Pontiac to Caseville, Mich., is 100 miles long. Two trains carry mail on this route, the daily weight of the mail being 926 pounds. The United States pays $8,282 a year for this service. The trains also carry passengers and express. The total cost of operating these two trains is $14,160 a year. The United States therefore pays 58 per cent of the cost of operation.

The name of this railroad is "The Pontiac, Oxford, and Northern." I am informed by officials of the Post-Office Department that it is in the hands of a receiver and that the receiver recently visited the Department with the purpose of trying to secure an increase in the compensation for carrying the mails and that the facts as to the service are these:

The mail service on this road is all apartment-car service—a typical route of this class. There are twenty-two post-offices on the route, at each of which the mail is delivered four times daily for three hundred and thirteen days each year for these offices and other post-offices tributary to them. At twelve different points the railroad company is required to deliver the mail from the station to the post-office, for which it pays out in cash $1,200, so that its yearly compensation is $7,062.12, or $22.50 per day. This is less than the fares of two passengers on the same trains, whose mileage (800 miles) at 3 cents per mile would yield the company $24, and less than the earnings on the lowest class of carload freight for an equal haul. This mail is not carried as freight, but upon two passenger and two mixed trains, and not in bulk as ordinary freight is transported, but in two apartment cars—fitted up as a post-office, each carrying a mail messenger. In one of these cars 18 feet of the space is occupied by mail; in the other 12 feet. This company performs 125,200 miles of mail service annually in this expensive way, and its compensation is 5.7 cents per mile, which is less than we pay per mile in the star route, and about half as much as each mile of rural free service costs the Government.

The operating expenses and interest upon the road for the year were $173,000, and its mail earnings amounted to 4 per cent of its expenses, instead of 58. The mails are carried upon four out of the six trains run on the road, and if the expenses were apportioned on the basis of trains the amount properly chargeable to these four trains would be $115,000, and the mail pay was 6 per cent of this sum.

What Member of the House is prepared to say that the Pontiac Railroad is overpaid for the service it is now rendering the Government? Who would vote to reduce that compensation 10 per cent or 5 per cent? I am assured by the officials of the Department familiar with the subject that the Pontiac case, as to compensation for work done, and as to expense to the railroad, and the value of the service to the public, and earnings from mail compared with passenger earnings, is fairly typical of the apartment-car service all over the country. If this subject is once opened up in earnest, we may expect an urgent demand from railroad companies that additional compensation be provided for in the apartment-car service.

THE POSTAL-CAR SERVICE.

There seems to be a prevalent misunderstanding as to the purpose and amount of what is designated as "postal-car pay." It is simply a misnomer to call this payment the "rent" of postal cars. It was provided in the original act of 1873 as a feature of the compensation to be allowed to roads which provided and hauled in their trains cars of this specified design, useless for any other traffic, but especially adapted for traveling post-offices.

This compensation, naturally enough, could only be allowed to such companies as conduct the business in that manner, and it seemed a fair provision that it should take the form of a wheelage rate, measured by the length of the car—that is, for a 40-foot car, 3.4 cents per mile run; for 45 feet, 4.1 cents; for 50 feet, 5.4 cents, and for 60 feet, 6.8 cents per mile run. What this amounts to per car was stated by Capt. James E. White, Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in his testimony as follows:

The average daily haul of a postal car is 250 miles; the actual cost to the railroad of hauling, lighting, heating, and repairing the car in one year amounts to $10,891. The Government pay for the use of the car is $6,250.

He probably estimated the cost of haulage at 9 or 10 cents per mile.

Prof. Henry C. Adams approved of the system, and said:

It is a payment, in addition to the regular payment for transportation, which the Government thought it wise to make in view of the fact that extra facilities were afforded.

The railroads do not need these postal cars for carrying the mails. They can stow all the mail bags in use on a four-car mail train in one baggage or storage car. These three postal cars additional are for post-offices only for Government use, and the roads which provide them must be paid for it or they will not furnish them. I will, with my remarks, refer to some of the evidence before the Wolcott commission relating to the reasonableness of this wheelage rate, the average paid by the Government for the country being, I think, 5 cents per mile of haul of each postal car.

I am endeavoring to make a direct and reasonable answer to the question of how much mail pay is received on the heavy routes of the country where the mail is practically all carried in postal cars, including this wheelage allowance, and whether it should be regarded as excessive. That is not a small inquiry, nor a very simple one. The earnings upon the so-called "heavy mail routes"—that is, routes carrying over 30,000 pounds of mail each way over the road daily—vary greatly. Some mail cars and trains which run west from New York and Chicago carry more than twice as much mail as the same cars carry coming east. Newspapers, magazines, and periodicals originate largely in the East and are carried west. But the cars must be run east as well as west, and the only way, of course, to know what any railroad company earns from the mail that is carried in postal cars is to ascertain what the average of its full postal cars earn east and west, including this wheelage allowance, and excluding cars held in reserve, for these reserve cars are never considered as a factor and are never paid for. The postal cars and trains on the heavy mail routes running west and east carry a much heavier weight of mail, and therefore earn much more than those running south and north.

Mr. Victor J. Bradley has for many years represented the Post-Office Department as eastern superintendent of mails, with headquarters in New York City. In his testimony, referring to the earnings of postal cars on the heavy routes, he said:

The average load carried by a postal car is about 2 tons of mail. Hence the average pay per car mile earned by a 60-foot postal car would be 11.70 cents for the weight of the mail carried in the car, plus the allowance for postal car, 6.84 cents, both together equal to 18.54 cents per car mile.

What Member of the House feels fully competent to say whether an earning capacity of 18.54 cents per car mile for a postal car is excessive or not—remembering that the car weighs 50 or 50 tons, is built for the Government's exclusive use and transported in passenger trains?

We have some knowledge of our own about how this compares, for instance, with earnings from passenger cars in suburban service where commutation rates prevail and are sometimes as low as 1 cent per mile. I am told that an average of 40 suburban passengers per car is a fair estimate. Such a passenger car will then earn 40 cents per car mile, compared with 18.54 cents earned by the average postal car in the country, according to Mr. Bradley, including the weight payment and the so-called extra compensation.

It is impossible to form an intelligent opinion whether the earnings of the heavy mail routes, where the bulk of the service is performed in postal cars, are excessive or not, without knowing the average load that is hauled in postal cars. Professor Adams fully recognized this. He said in his report:

The average load in a postal car is only 2 tons, and if you can not make it more than 2 tons, then the overpay, if there is overpay, lies on those routes where, as a matter of fact, they have an excess of 2 tons.

This view, that the question whether the large roads are overpaid depends upon what is the average load we permit the railroads to carry in postal cars, was also controlling with Mr. Loud, who was for years chairman of the Post-Office Committee, and a man who in an unusual degree possessed the confidence and esteem of this House. In his speech of February 6, 1901, reviewing the work of the Wolcott Commission, he said:

I came to Congress with the idea, because it was prevalent, that the railroad companies of this country were, to put it in a rough way, robbing the Government of a large amount of money every year. I believed it in a general way, without investigation, because people in whom I believed said so. The Commission, I suppose, were substantially at the beginning in the same frame of mind.

The investigation, which was carried on for about two years and a half, seems to have entirely changed Mr. Loud's opinion in the matter, and he joined in the Commission's report against reduction. His view, one result of the investigation, regarding the loading of postal cars, was expressed in this way:

The testimony shows that 2 tons is the average load. A postal car could carry 4 tons or 5 tons, but there are several things to consider. The car starts out for the West with more mail than it ever has again; the mail of one day may be double the mail of another. The question is what is the average weight carried from the start to the return, and if you assume an average of 4 tons, the car must have started with 16 tons, which no one contends can be loaded into a post-office car, fitted up as a post-office.

He incorporated in his remarks detailed statements regarding the service performed on the three heaviest mail routes of the country, namely, from New York to Philadelphia, from Philadelphia to Pittsburg by the Pennsylvania, and from New York to Buffalo by the New York Central—routes each carrying 300,000 pounds of mail daily. I shall add these important statements to my remarks. They show that the average load carried per postal car, not including storage cars, was, over one route, 4,320 pounds; over the second, 4,241 pounds, and over the third, 4,520 pounds—an average of 4,390 pounds, or a fraction over 2 tons per car. Based upon these figures, Mr. Loud expressed his conviction that but for the mail messenger service the small roads, carrying only 200 pounds of mail per day, are better paid than those carrying 300,000 pounds daily.

THE FAST MAIL TRAINS.

I have sought to examine each class of this service as it is conducted over the railroads of the country and apply to it, as nearly as possible, the test of reasonableness. There remains to consider the fast mail, or special train service, which, by degrees, the Post-Office Department has induced the larger railroads of the country to undertake, some of them (the Pennsylvania and New York Central systems) now running eight special fast mail trains, substantially carrying nothing but mail. These trains now carry a large percentage of the mails of the country. How much do they earn? Do they earn so much, are they so lucrative, that we ought to take the chances of their discontinuance by reducing the rates applicable to them?

Every pound of mail carried in these special mail trains goes at the minimum rate of about 6 cents per ton per mile, and is transported in postal cars traveling at the highest rate of speed, so that the maximum cost to the railroad is combined with the minimum of rate. Their earnings depend on how much they carry. A special mail train from New York to Philadelphia that is composed of three railway post-office cars can possibly carry 22 tons of mail, and with the rate of 6½ cents per ton per mile could, according to Professor Adams, earn $1.43 per train mile. If it carried four postal cars it could possibly earn $1.56 per train mile.

That is the most profitable mail train that the Pennsylvania road, with its dense traffic, can theoretically operate; it can not add another car and make the speed required in that particular service. There was produced before the Wolcott Commission complete and precise statistics showing the actual earnings of the three special mail trains operated from Chicago to Council Bluffs over the Burlington road, the principal line in the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor—namely, train 15, west bound, $1.32 per mile; train 7, the newspaper train, also west bound, 82 cents per mile, and train 8, east bound, 61 cents per train mile, an average of 92 cents per train mile. These are actual results, including the weight compensation and postal-car pay, compared with the much higher theoretical results on the Pennsylvania road.

How much per train mile should a railroad earn to make a fair profit in running a train of this character? The Interstate Commerce Commission has published the actual cost of operating all passenger trains over the Pennsylvania road as $1.13 per train mile, and to this Professor Adams had added 33 per cent for interest, fixed charges, etc., bringing the cost above $1.50 per train mile.

Mr. Bradley's figures of actual tonnage earnings of the special train between New York and Philadelphia, carrying 15 tons of mail, are 98.5 cents per train mile. If there were 4 postal cars in this train, 27.4 cents ought to be added for the postal-car pay, making the actual earnings of the train $1.26 per train mile. If the average cost of passenger trains is $1.50 per train mile and the total earnings of the trains are $1.26 per train mile, is there overpayment in that branch of the service? While the earnings of the Burlington road from its three special mail trains average 92 cents per train mile, the average earnings of its passenger trains are officially reported to be $1.09 cents per train mile. The unusually expensive character of the special mail trains is well known. One of these trains which passes through the city where I live is scheduled at 50 miles per hour, including all stops; it must run over stretches of the road at a speed of 80 miles an hour, and is said to be the fastest train of its character in the world. All other business must give way to it, and the incidental expense caused by the delays to other traffic is, I know, regarded as an important feature, although naturally difficult to estimate.

While I have sought in my remarks to fairly examine and consider this mail traffic as it is carried on in the separate ways of pouch service or mail-bag service, apartment, and postal car and special-train service, all these various classes are simultaneously and constantly being carried on over every line of road in the country constituting a large mail route, and the sum of all the weights carried each way daily over the entire route in whatever class is the basis of the mail payment. The Pennsylvania road, for illustration, is paid on precisely the same basis as smaller roads for carrying the mails between New York and Philadelphia, where the average daily weight paid for is 309,000 pounds. This weight could be easily carried as freight in one 12-car train; many freight trains with seventy-five loaded cars are operated over western railroads. The Pennsylvania does, in fact, carry this 309,000 pounds of mail between New York and Philadelphia upon more than 140 different trains each day.

The postal car, carrying only two or three tons of mail, earns less for the railroad than its ordinary passenger coach; the special mail train, run at thundering speed, earns less than the actual average cost of its passenger-train service. Shall we from this conclude that the roads are carrying the mails at a loss? No; that does not appear to me a reasonable conclusion. In the average train-mile cost of passenger service on the Pennsylvania was included 38 cents for "interest and fixed charges." These would continue about the same if the road carried no mails. In this average train-mile cost are included all the items of maintenance of the roadway, station service, clerks, superintendence, and many others which would go on practically undiminished if no fast mail trains were operated.

Railroads undoubtedly accept and are glad to get many lines of business which pay less than the average cost of operation per car or per train. There is some profit to them if they can earn from the particular traffic something beyond the actual cost to them of handling that traffic. The mails are a necessity to the people and the people are the customers of the railroad. The Government, in this respect, is fortunate in finding this machine to command; more fortunate far, in my opinion, than if it owned the machine itself, with all its responsibilities and risks. The railroads seem willing to accept the business at the existing rates and to comply as to apartment cars and postal cars and special trains with the exacting and expensive wishes and requirements of the Post-Office Department, and I doubt if there are many railroad managers who know exactly whether they are making money on the business or not. What should be the attitude of Congress? I believe that there are few Members of this House who are not willing for the Government to pay the railroads for carrying the mails not only that proportion of expense which is properly chargeable to this class of their traffic, but such additional expense as they necessarily incur in according to us unusual space in cars and extraordinary facilities in speed, and we are also willing to pay the proportional share of a fair return upon the capital invested. Some of the roads are probably being thus compensated at the present time, but I doubt if many of them are, if the truth was known, so urgent have been the demands of the public for greater frequency and promptness in the mail service and judging from the evidence before the Wolcott Commission and the opinions of men who know how the business is conducted.

REDUCTION OF RATE SINCE 1878.

I would like to add a word upon the question whether the law has been changed or these rates reduced since 1878. The answer is that the law has not been changed, but the rates have been reduced. This law of 1873 is so skillfully drawn that it changes or its results change in the interest of the Government every year, with the effect of securing for us a constant and material and very satisfactory reduction in the rates. What we wish to know is whether we are receiving for the Government our share of the benefits flowing from the increase of volume and from greater density of traffic and the economies in railroad transportation which are incident to its marvelous growth. This was a feature which seems to have particularly interested Mr. Moody, now Attorney-General, and a member of the Wolcott Commission, and is discussed by him in his report. He quotes from the statistics furnished by Professor Adams to the effect that for our entire mail traffic, including postal-car pay, we paid the railroads at the rate of 26 cents per ton per mile in 1873, but that we only paid 12 cents per ton per mile in 1898, a decrease of more than one-half. Is that sufficient? He then compares the extent of this decline with the fall in other transportation charges since 1881, the earliest date when authentic figures were procurable. During that period of seventeen years Professor Adams states that passenger rates in this country fell 21 per cent, freight rates fell 41 per cent, and mail rates fell 39 per cent.

Professor Adams also reported the very significant fact that, while the annual rate of expenditure to railroads for carrying the mails from 1873 to 1898 had increased 425 per cent, the annual ton mileage of mail carried by the railroads had increased 1,004 per cent. This means that since 1873 the service performed for us by the railroads, measured by tons of mail carried, has increased two and one-half times as fast as their compensation, and we all know that the facilities in space and speed have increased in a still faster proportion. This means that they are steadily doing more business for less money—that is, that their rates to us are steadily falling.

Mail is always carried on passenger trains, and it is a passenger rather than a freight traffic, and Mr. Moody shows from the statistics of Professor Adams that the decline in mail rates paid by the Government is almost double the decline in passenger rates in the same period. Is that sufficient? It was satisfactory to Mr. Moody, especially in view of the almost complete revolution which the Post-Office Department has brought about in the handling of the mails upon all of the important routes.

It was satisfactory to the Wolcott Commission and, so far as we know, is satisfactory to the Post-Office Department. Mr. Moody calls it an "automatic" reduction. Upon principle this would seem to be a wiser method for securing a satisfactory change and reduction in the cost of this service in the interest of the Government and the people than the careless and necessarily ignorant method of making a horizontal cut or percentage reduction whenever the political impulse happens to seize us.

It may be suggested by some one that the review I have made of the different classes of mail service which we require from the companies and the compensation attached to each will be regarded as a statement of the railroad side of the case. That would be to utter a mere prejudice. A more sensible view is to regard it as a presentation of some of the difficulties before us. These difficulties have confronted each successive Postmaster-General and each Post-Office Committee for a generation and have confronted the five investigating commissions which from time to time during the past twenty-five years have made special inquiry into this subject. Why has there been this remarkable unanimity of conclusion that the law of 1873 is a wise law and with its great automatic reduction in the rate as the business increases that it is securing for us a substantial and sufficient reduction from year to year in the compensation that we pay to the railroads? It is because when genuine inquiry has been made the facts disclosed always seem to warrant this conclusion, and, after all, truth and fair dealing must be our chief reliance in our relations with the railroads as with all others.

THREE HEAVIEST MAIL ROUTES—AVERAGE POSTAL CARLOAD, 2 TONS.

Statement explanatory of postal car and mail service on route 109004, New York to Philadelphia, and route 110001, Philadelphia to Pittsburg, Pa.

Route 109004.—The statement is made upon the basis of through service, and shows 28 trains carrying postal cars or apartments, and which carry 80 per cent of the weight of mail. There were in addition to these 28 postal-car trains 112 other trains—some through trains, but mostly local—which carried 20 per cent of the weight. On the 28 postal-car trains there were altogether 171 cars, of which 41 were postal or storage cars; thus showing that the ratio was 1 postal car to 4 other cars per train.

Of storage cars, there were 6 out of 41, or about 14 per cent. On the basis of space, the entire equipment of storage cars would be about 11 per cent of the equipment of postal cars. It is shown that the average load per car, including storage cars, was 6,029 pounds, and excluding storage cars, 4,320 pounds.

Of the 28 postal-car trains shown, 6 trains had a mail apartment, constituting about one-half a car each; 15 trains had 1 postal car each; 5 trains had 2 postal cars each; 1 train had 3 postal cars, and 1 train had 4 postal cars.

Route 110001.—The statement is made upon the basis of through service, and shows 17 trains carrying postal cars or apartments, and which carry 96.5 per cent of the weight of mail. There were in addition to these 17 postal-car trains, 94 other trains, some through trains, but mostly local, which carried 3.5 per cent of the weight. On the 17 postal-car trains there were altogether 113 cars, of which 28 were postal or storage cars; thus showing that the ratio was 1 postal car to 4 other cars per train.

Of storage cars there were 5 out of 28, or about 18 per cent. On the basis of space the entire equipment of storage cars would be about 13 per cent of the equipment of postal cars. It is shown that the average load per car, including storage cars, was 6,341 pounds; and excluding storage cars, 4,241 pounds.

Of the 17 postal-car trains shown, 5 trains had a mail apartment constituting about one-half a car each; 6 trains had 1 postal car each; 5 trains had 2 postal cars each; 1 train had 4 postal cars.

NOTE.—It is understood that the railroad company's computations show that between 9 and 10 per cent of all passenger-train space, including local trains, is used for mail purposes between New York and Pittsburg. Also that the average number of cars per passenger train between New York and Pittsburg is 5.91.

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
New York, March 1½, 1900.

Statement explanatory of postal car and mail service on route 107011, New York to Buffalo, N. Y.

Route 107011.—The statement is made on the basis of through service, and shows 19 trains carrying postal cars or apartments, and which carry 94 per cent of the mail. There were, in addition to these 19 postal-car trains, 57 other trains—some through trains, but mostly local—which carried 6 per cent of the weight. On the 19 postal-car trains there were altogether 137 cars, of which 34 were postal or storage cars; thus showing that the ratio was 1 postal car to 4 other cars per train.

Of storage cars there were 7 out of 34, or about 20 per cent. On the basis of space, the entire equipment of storage cars would be about 26 per cent of the equipment of postal cars. It is shown that the average load per car, including storage cars, was 6,884 pounds, and excluding storage cars, 4,520 pounds.

Of the postal-car trains shown 6 trains had a mail apartment constituting about one-half a car each, 6 trains had 1 postal car each, 1 train had 2 postal cars, 4 trains had 3 postal cars each, and 1 train had 4 postal cars.

Wheelage rate on postal cars.

The following evidence was before the Wolcott commission, showing the usual rates prevailing among railroads for hauling empty cars.

J. H. Sturgis, of St. Joseph, Mo., auditor of the Hannibal and St. Joseph road, testified:

"The postal car compensation on the Burlington system in 1897 was $220,580; the postal cars were hauled 4,740,703 miles, being an average rate of 4.65 cents per mile.

"For hauling home for repairs by freight train a freight car of private ownership, the railroad charges 5 cents per mile."

S. C. Johnson, St. Louis, auditor of the Cotton Belt road, testified:

"The postal car pay received by this road averages 3.12 cents per car mile. The established rate paid by railroads to other roads for the use of passenger cars is 3 cents per mile, and the road using the car pays all the incident expenses of heating, lighting, etc. When we haul a Pullman sleeper deadhead over the line we receive 20 cents per car mile, and furnish no light or heat, but they are more expensive to haul than mail cars."

George H. Crosby, of Chicago, secretary of the Rock Island road, testified:

"The average revenue per mile run by the Rock Island for postal car pay is 4.82 cents. The western classification rate on empty postal cars hauled in freight trains is 15 cents per mile."

Erastus Young, of Omaha, auditor of the Union Pacific road, testified:

"This company receives 5.5 cents per mile as postal car compensation.

"The legal rate for hauling empty mail cars on freight trains is 15 cents per mile, and on passenger trains would be greater. We, in fact, charge other companies 10 cents per mile for hauling mail cars empty over our lines."

Thomas Wickes, of Chicago, vice-president of the Pullman Company, was asked the following questions by Hon. William H. Fleming:

Q. "Mr. Wickes, doesn't it frequently happen that your company has to transport an empty Pullman car from some one point where your factory is located to some other point where it is to go on an active run? What do you have to pay the railroad company for transporting that empty Pullman car?"—A. "Between 10 and 14 cents per mile; 10, 12, or 14 cents. We have paid as high as 20 cents a mile."

Q. "Ten to 14 is the average?"—A. "Probably 12 would be a good average."

The highest pay per mile that can, under the law, be made for the largest postal car is 6.84 cents.

If the Government owned the car, a reasonable charge for hauling it empty would be 10 cents per mile.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE. Mr. Chairman, during my brief career in this House I have heard debates on rate legislation, the Philippine tariff, statehood, appropriations, and many other questions of national importance. I have had the pleasure of listening to many interesting speeches, but I invite your attention to a question more vital to the farmers of this Republic than any yet discussed in this House.

The distinguished Secretary of Agriculture has recently said:

> The farming element, or about 35 per cent of the population, has produced an amount of wealth within ten years equal to one-half of the entire national wealth produced by the toil and composed of the surpluses and savings of three centuries.

Being myself of this class—which so largely supports the country, but whose interests are so seldom recognized in our legislative halls, although entitled to some special considerations—I propose to briefly discuss the importance of governmental aid in the building of good country roads.

All civilized governments build roads. All save our own have some established system for building and maintaining public highways, under the direction of skilled and competent officials. Early in this century some work of this kind was done by the Federal Government.

The dawn of railway building and steam transportation seems to have largely drawn public attention and enterprise from our common highways, as a natural consequence, for more than fifty years—years that have been full of throbbing life and vigor for us as a nation; years that have seen our wealth doubled and trebled and quadrupled until the figures that express it are so large that they no longer convey a definite and intelligent idea to the ordinary mind; years that have no parallel in the history of our race for triumphs of man over nature, of mind over matter; years that have seen continents girdled with belts of steel and lightning highways strung across every sea; years that have been filled with a succession of wonders and triumphs in every field of human thought and endeavor. But the greatest wonder of all these wondrous years is that as a nation we have utterly ignored our country roads, and we seem surprised when we look about us and find them no better than they were half a century ago.

Some ten years ago the public mind began to quicken on this subject in a few isolated and circumscribed spots over the country. Somebody stopped long enough to glance around and remark that our country roads were not keeping step with this age of progress and improvement. At first these remarks attracted about as much attention as does the usual observation about the weather being unsatisfactory, just as if bad weather and bad roads were necessarily coexistent evils.

But as the need for better roads increased with even pace with the increase of population, the volume of complaint grew larger and louder, until at last the sapient conclusion was reached that the road question had attained the proportions of a problem. Then solutions were in order—and are yet, for bad roads, like the poor, we have always with us.

At first there was a pretty general agreement among those engaged in road building, academically, to relegate the whole job to the farmer, and he was advised to "hump himself" and build better roads. But the farmer, being already saddled with our tariff taxes and ridden by our "infant industries," booted and spurred, has had little time and less money to devote to the theory and practice of road building. Still, whatever has been done in that line he has had it to do.

So here we are yet, right in the middle of the road, and the very sorriest kind of a road at that. "A condition confronts us, not a theory." Are not a hundred years of observation long enough to convince us that the roads will not reform themselves?

The able and honorable Secretary of Agriculture estimates that the cost, the extra burdens imposed upon this country by bad roads, is not less than $600,000,000 annually. These figures almost stagger credulity, but who can gainsay them? And yet, when a bill was recently offered in this House to appropriate $25,000,000 annually for abating this great and continuing loss it was ridiculed in some quarters as a fake—visionary and impracticable—as if it were wild and unreasonable to stop a leak of hundreds of millions of dollars with this comparatively small appropriation. But those who reviled it have not seized upon the opportunity to propose a better plan.

The great problem of the ages—of this age and of all ages—has been and is to bring the producer and the consumer into the easiest and quickest possible communication with each other. To this end we build mighty navies; to this end we girdle the earth with railroads and tangle the air with telegraph wires; to this end we thrust tunnels under vast mountain ranges and rend continents asunder with interoceanic canals. The millions and billions that are needed for these vast enterprises are flung at them with prodigal hand. Forty millions of dollars were promptly handed out from the Public Treasury to pay for the privilege of spending two hundred millions more to dig a ditch in foreign lands more than a thousand miles from home. Not one one-hundredth of 1 per cent of our people will ever see it; not 1 in 1,000 of our people will ever feel his burdens lightened or his joy and comforts of life increased when it is finished. One-half the sum it will cost, if intelligently expended upon our public highways during the next ten years, would give 100 times as many comforts and pleasures to 1,000 times as many of our people. The canal will be a great public utility, no doubt, and I do not wish to appear to oppose this great work, but better roads are a crying public need, now—every day. [Applause.]

As long as the farmer was the only sufferer from bad roads there was little likelihood of an appeal in their behalf ever reaching the Public Treasury. For armies and navies, for forts and arsenals, for armor and projectiles, and all the wants and whims of those who fight, we hand out unstinted millions; to those who plow, and sow, and reap we dole out grudging pennies.

The appropriations for war and kindred purposes (including pensions) last year were $335,867,482. Nearly half our entire income expended—for what? Put your finger on the net returns. An archipelago full of Malays and malaria, 10,000 miles from our shores; a trail of transports streaming out at the Golden Gate and across the Pacific with thousands upon thousands of the flower of our young manhood, and returning with their overflowing cargoes of diseased and maimed—pensioners to be!

Here at home are millions of patient, plodding, toiling farmers, who pay taxes enough to foot the whole enormous Army and Navy and pension bills and two hundred millions more for other expenses. And yet these toiling, patient farmers are never heard of except when Secretary Wilson issues his annual report. When the paltry sum of less than $7,000,000 is asked for this Department—every dollar of which the farmers themselves have paid into the Treasury a hundred times over—gentlemen elevate their brows, and, with a look of interrogation, scrutinize and criticise every item. A fearful hue and cry is now in the air about a trifle of $200,000 expended by the Department in seed and plant distribution to farmers. Why, $200,000 will not pay for the ammunition our valiant Army and Navy use for shooting holes in the atmosphere—target practice, they call it. [Laughter.] Two hundred thousand dollars used by the Army and Navy go up in smoke in a few days! Two hundred thousand dollars expended for seeds by the Agricultural Department carry pleasure and comfort into 2,000,000 homes. But they are not fighters and do not wear fine uniforms and gold lace. They are just farmers, and do nothing much but produce all the food and clothing for the world. [Laughter and applause.]

Of the more than eight hundred and twenty millions carried in the appropriation bills last year, the farmer contributed about 68 per cent, or nearly five hundred and fifty-eight millions. Although thus heavily taxed and bestrode by a burly and brutal tariff monster, he added more to the aggregate wealth of the country than all other sources combined. [Applause.]

The total value of the products of the soil last year is put at six and one-half billions of dollars. It is interesting to note the value of the principal farm products for the year 1905:

Corn crop	$1,216,000,000
Hay	605,000,000
Wheat	525,000,000
Oats	282,000,000
Potatoes	138,000,000
Barley	58,000,000
Tobacco	52,000,000
Sugar cane	50,000,000
Rice	15,000,000
Cotton	685,000,000

The total value of the cotton crop of the South for the last five years is worth $400,000,000, more than all the gold and silver mined in the world for the same number of years.

Every pound of this inconceivably vast tonnage must be moved to market over our present execrable roads, 85 per cent of which are practically impassable for loaded teams during half the year.

If the Army needs a road, it gets it. Even our unprofitable and expensive possessions, the Philippine Islands in the Far East, have been the objects of our solicitous care to the extent of expending $5,000,000 in building roads for them. Porto Rico, though not much larger in area than some of our counties, has had over $3,000,000 expended upon its roads since it came into our possession. During our brief occupancy of the island of Cuba our Government expended two and a half millions upon its public roads. Even those little dots out in the Pacific, the Hawaiian Islands, acquired by diplomatic legerdemain, have come in for a share and have a contemplated expenditure of two and a half millions upon their roads.

These various sums aggregate $13,000,000 that have been expended during the past few years in building roads, not a foot of which lie within the United States. What have we against our own people that we should deny to them blessings that are freely extended to the idle islanders of the seas?

But other interests and forces are coming to the aid of the solitary, the isolated, the unorganized, and almost unorganizable farmer. His friends in the cities, having grown rich and equipped themselves liberally with self-propelling vehicles, want better roads to roll them over, and they are interested in the problem of the roads. The manufacturer, learning from experience that bad roads interfere materially with his obtaining steady and continuous supplies of raw material, wants the roads improved. The millions of operatives in mines, mills, and shops are learning that bad roads increase the cost and disturb the regular supply of food products from the farms which they must have, and they want better roads. The merchant has learned that bad roads retard and depress trade, and he wants them mended. Our Post-Office Department is greatly hindered and hampered in its efforts to supply to the country regular, prompt, and reliable mail service for lack of better roads. In fact, it would be hard to name an interest, an industry, or an individual who would not be benefited by better roads.

The question of railway rate legislation has commanded the attention of this House for days and weeks, and has been receiving the serious thought of the Senate for weeks. For years it has aroused the deepest interest throughout the country, and I would by no means disparage the importance of this question; but, sir, I call your attention to the fact that the average charge of railroad transportation of freight throughout the country is three-fourths of 1 cent per mile for the hauling of a ton of freight. Now, mark you, that the average cost of hauling freight over dirt roads is 25 cents per ton, or thirty-three times as much, and further, bear in mind, that the freight that is hauled over the railroads in a large part must first travel the dirt road; in fact, 98 per cent of the freight that is shipped over railroads must first pass over a dirt road to get to a railroad for transportation. Does not this impress the importance of the improvement of our roads throughout the land?

If I had the privilege of writing upon our statute books a law that had more of the promise and potency for immediate and lasting good to all the people than any law that has been proposed or discussed in this Hall, it would be a law creating a Department of Public Highways, to act through and in conjunction with State, county, and municipal authorities in redeeming our country from the throes and thraldom of its miserable roads; and I would give that Department not less than fifty millions a year until the work had reached a satisfactory stage of advancement.

A distinguished Senator, in the debate on the rate bill a few days ago, stated that a reduction of 1 cent per ton per mile in the present rates on all freights would put more than half the railroads in the hands of receivers. If this be true, what must be the appalling cost to the country of a system of public roads that increases the cost of moving its vast agricultural products, not 1 cent only, but five or ten times as much per ton per mile? A simple arithmetical calculation would give us the figures, but the mind could scarcely grasp their staggering import.

Mr. Chairman, when we find we are in the wrong road, no matter how long nor how far we have traveled it, it is the part of wisdom to stop and change our course. For a hundred years we have waited for this road problem to be worked out under the old methods, and we are only getting deeper in the mud. To the principle and practice of extending Federal aid to road building we have already been long committed. I take pleasure in mentioning the fact that more than seventy years ago the Hon. John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, advocated the very idea proposed in a bill which I had the honor to introduce here recently. He advocated the division of the surplus among the States and the expenditure of it by the States in road building. And another southern statesman, the Hon. Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, was the very first, I believe, to give official indorsement to the idea of a transcontinental railway to be built by the Federal Government. Had his recommendation, made while he was Secretary of War in 1855, been carried out, what an ugly chapter in our history might have been omitted, and what an empire of public lands, granted finally for this purpose, would have remained the property of the home seeker.

But if there were neither law nor precedent for the General Government to engage in road building, it is high time we were making both. Congress is wisely encouraging and sustaining the Post-Office Department in its efforts to extend the wonderfully vitalizing and educating benefits of free rural mail delivery. Nothing that has been undertaken by the General Government since the establishment of the Post-Office Department has proven so immediately and universally popular as these daily rural mails. To send these mails daily over such roads as we have now must be done at an expenditure of money and labor and energy and time that would be reduced in many instances by half if the roads were given proper attention. Nothing will contribute more to the rapid extension and improvement of this service than to improve the roads over which it must travel.

I do not believe that this Congress can make a more useful expenditure of public funds than in the direction I have indicated, nor one that would be more immediately and lastingly popular and beneficial. Then shall every interest be guarded by national legislation, and the welfare of that class which affords sustenance to all classes be not neglected. Shall no voice be heard in behalf of the millions of farmers in the United States? These people maintain no lobbies at your portals. They have trusted to your high sense of duty, to your loyalty to the supreme interest of the Republic. Will you longer disappoint them? [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the levy and collection of taxes is one of the most important functions of the modern State, and I know of no better time to discuss this great subject than now, when we have under consideration a bill which carries $191,000,000.

There has grown up in this country within the last few years a system of levying taxes not dreamed of by the founders of the Republic; a system of taxation in existence at the present time in no other great commercial nation in all the world; a system of taxation that Alexander Hamilton did not believe in nor did he indorse. His dictum was, and he repeated it on all occasions wherever he had an opportunity, that subsidies might be properly paid to industries newly established, but their continuance upon industries long established was most questionable.

A great party followed in his footsteps for many years, but a few years ago, when the so-called "McKinley tariff" was under discussion, they for the first time threw aside the mask and declared themselves in favor of that system of taxation which might be exercised not for the purpose of raising revenue, not for the purpose of subserving any interest of the State, but they claimed then for the first time, in opposition to the teachings of the great Hamilton, that they had a right to delegate the taxing power to individuals and to private corporations, to be exercised by them for their own personal and private benefit.

As a result of this sort of practice, already in this country it has not only become impossible to buy in the cheapest market, but it has become impossible for the American citizen to buy American-made goods in the cheapest market. Up here for 1,500 miles along our northern frontier they have built a railroad out of American steel rails, and it cost $27 a ton for the rails that built every mile of it. It cost $27 per ton for the rails that built every mile of siding and for the rails that keep it in repair. Just on the other side of the border, over in Canada, they have built another railroad—in every sense of the term a parallel and competing line—out of rails that cost $22 per ton; but the rails out of which the Canadian road is built and the rails out of which the American road is built all came from the same factory here in the United States, protected by our tariff laws.

Are the men who build our railroads permitted under these circumstances to buy American-made goods as cheaply at home as American-made goods can be bought in another country?

Not long ago there was considerable talk in the papers upon the question of the material and all structural iron intended to be used in the construction of the Panama Canal, and the people learned, through the President of the United States, and it was an object lesson to all of them, that if American-made goods, American structural iron and steel, could be purchased at the export price, at the price the steel companies charged for it 3,000 miles away across the sea, it would result in the saving of untold millions of dollars to the United States Government.

Back of a tariff wall make one price. Just on the other side and out in the open the protected factories meet the competition of the world, and they meet it successfully, and they make there another and cheaper price. Back of the tariff wall our agricultural-implement factories manufacture plows and harrows and other agricultural implements, and they ship them to all the agricultural sections of all the world, and they sell them from 25 to 50 per cent cheaper than the American farmer who lives within 50 miles of the factory can buy them. They sell in South America drills and plows and harrows, and the sheep farmer of South America, with American-made goods purchased from 25 to 40 and 50 per cent cheaper than the American farmer can buy them, plows up his sheep pastures, sows wheat, and sends that wheat to Liverpool there to compete with the products of the American farm.

These facts have been brought home to all of us for many years. Before the last Presidential election there were murmurs of discontent from the Republicans in the States of the far East.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, before my friend gets on to another subject, would it interrupt him if I should ask him a question at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I certainly yield.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Is my friend aware that in the last report of the British Iron Trade Journal steel rails are quoted at £6 5s. a ton, which is a little over $31, and that they are quoted at $28 a ton in the United States?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, that sometimes occurs. That occurred in 1898, but for only sixty days. That is a mere temporary condition, the gentleman will find.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. The gentleman admits the fact.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not admit the fact. I do not know.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. That is what I want to find out. It is a fact.

Mr. RAINEY. We shipped abroad in 1899, $9,000,000 worth of steel rails when we were selling steel rails here for $27 a ton and when they were selling for $22 a ton across the sea, and we competed, and competed successfully, with that price. Why, if you could buy the structural steel and the ship plates that go into a 12,000-ton vessel at the export price—if you could buy at the English price—a 12,000-ton vessel would cost $250,000 less in this country than it costs now to build. Under these circumstances, is it not time to at least somewhat modify our present tariff schedules? Murmurs of discontent were heard before the last Presidential election. In the Far East—from the Republicans of Massachusetts—there came murmurs of discontent in no uncertain terms. In the great States of the Northwest the same kind of murmurs were heard, and in the great States of the Middle West.

Before entering upon the last campaign and when the President of the United States was notified on the 27th day of July, 1904, of his nomination at the hands of a great party, in response to the official notification of the action of the Republican convention, he said, and I am quoting his exact language:

> That whenever the need arises there should be a readjustment of tariff schedules is undoubted, but such changes can with safety be made only by those whose devotion to the principle of a protective tariff is beyond question, for otherwise the changes would amount not to readjustment, but to repeal. The readjustment when made must maintain and not destroy the protective principle.

And Republicans, from one end of the land to the other, who were complaining about the tariff were satisfied with this statement. They were led to believe that the way to get a readjustment of tariff schedules was to elect to this House men who were friends of the protective tariff. It was the old argument that the tariff must be revised in the house of its friends, and the campaign proceeded. One million five hundred thousand Democrats stayed away from the polls, and enough friends of the protective tariff were elected to this House to accomplish some results. They elected so many friends of the protective tariff that they have overflowed this side of the Chamber, and as we sit here there are Republicans to the right of us, Republicans to the left of us, and Republicans in front of us, and sometimes, when we turn around, there are so many of them here we find them behind us also.

No House in the last fifty years ever had so many friends of the protective-tariff system as the present House. We sit here a small oasis in a desert of Republicans. You can not expect at any time in the future to get more Republicans here than you have here now; but you can expect this fall, if you do not make a substantial revision of these tariff schedules, to have less, and a good many less. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We were prepared for the letter of the majority leader to the Massachusetts delegation. That did not surprise the country any. It was foreshadowed over a year ago by the American Protective Tariff League. Why, as soon as you were able to cross the Rubicon, as soon as you obtained this enormous majority in this House, your zeal for tariff reform ended, and the majority leader, when he made public on the 24th day of last month his letter, did not settle anything that we did not already know. After the elections were safely passed, and at its twentieth annual meeting, the American Protective Tariff League, speaking, as it always does, for the Republican party, in the resolutions it adopted in the city of New York a little over a year ago, said:

> The voters of the United States were asked to choose between the party of tariff destruction and the party of tariff maintenance. Their choice was made. * * * The people by an enormous majority have once more expressed their complete approval of that system and policy. They have declared once more in favor of tariff peace; of tariff stability.

And now, corroborating the orders issued by the Protective-Tariff League a little over a year ago, and in obedience thereto and in order to find another excuse for not revising the tariff schedules at this session, the majority leader, in his efforts now to quiet the apprehensions of the Massachusetts delegation, in order to settle forever so far as this Congress is concerned the question of tariff revision, announces this as the reason for the refusal of the Republican party to act, and I quote from his letter:

> Congress is not prepared to review the tariff schedules in that calm, judicial frame of mind so necessary to the proper preparation of a tariff act at a time so near the coming Congressional elections.

The excuse at the next session of Congress will be that it is the short session of Congress and we can not attempt anything of that kind, and the excuse at the following session will be that a Presidential election is approaching and that we can not maintain a "judicial frame of mind," and it will not do to surrender in the presence of the enemy. After that, my friends, you will not find it necessary to make any excuses. After that there will be no Republican Members sitting on this side of the Chamber [applause on the Democratic side] and the tariff will be revised. The demands of the people will be met, and the tariff will be revised by the only party in this country that ever will revise it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can not fool the people always. You were able to do it just before the last Presidential election. You have been able to do it in the sessions of Congress that have elapsed since then, but you can not keep up this sort of dawdling always. The people of the United States in this century and at this time demand action.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to talk this afternoon about watches, not because watches form any exception to the general rule, not because they are the only articles that are shipped abroad and sold cheaper than they are sold here at home, but because in the last three months, through the energy of a typical Democrat who lives in the city of New York, it is possible this afternoon to make of watches an object lesson; and I have caused to be displayed here in this Chamber, on the easel in front of the Speaker's desk, in the presence of the Members of this House, a photograph, 40 by 70 inches in size, taken in the city of New York two weeks ago. It represents an ordinary scene in front of the store of Mr. Charles A. Keene, at 180 Broadway, in that city. Across the front of his store is stretched a sign, covering an entire story of that store, upon which, as you all can see no matter where you sit in the room, is inscribed the following:

> Great protection sale. Waltham and Elgin watches bought in England cheaper than in America and brought back to undersell this market. Charles A. Keene, 180 Broadway, New York.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman whether this advertising picture was taken at the instance of Mr. Keene?

Mr. RAINEY. The advertising picture was taken at my instance, at my request, and by my photographer, and I expect to pay for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I brought it here, and I have also brought a number of watches here from his stock. I have brought it here this afternoon, and I am going to conduct a kindergarten for "stand-pat" Republicans [applause on the Democratic side], and you gentlemen will not disconcert me by asking questions.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Does Mr. Keene sell these goods cheaper in New York than they are sold by other people there?

Mr. RAINEY. I am proceeding to discuss that question.

Mr. LACEY. I just want to get the facts. He imports them from England and sells them cheaper here, does he, than other people do?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not want the gentleman to make my speech.

Mr. LACEY. I want to know whether he pays the duty on them or whether he smuggles them in.

Mr. RAINEY. He has 2,400 watches hung up there now, or they were until the 31st of March, in the custom-house at New York, brought back from England. I will satisfy the gentleman on that point before I get through.

Mr. LACEY. I want to know whether he pays this duty and still sells them cheaper than other people do here. If he does, then the duty certainly does not have anything to do with it.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has asked these questions. They furnish me with a line of argument, and I will answer every one of them as I proceed. I have no objection to questions from every stand-pat Republican in this House.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a statement here?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I want to corroborate what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] says with regard to that. For nearly five years I have had my offices in the same building, and I have seen that sign there for the last three or four months. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to find out why he does not add the duty to the price, if he paid the duty.

Mr. RAINEY. I will answer the question fully before I get through.

Mr. GOULDEN. For three or four months the same sign you see there has been on the front of that building to my personal knowledge.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa, and I will satisfy every Republican in the House before I get through that the tariff schedules ought to be revised, and if I do not succeed in satisfying them, I will succeed in satisfying their constituents by putting this argument and these facts and this evidence in the RECORD, and if I succeed in satisfying their constituents, there will be many of them—and I shall not regret it—who will be relegated when the Sixtieth Congress meets to the private walks of life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My attention was first directed to this gentleman's business by advertisements he inserted in the New York papers. I did not pay much attention to them until I found a half-page advertisement in the New York Press, and I thought that a half-page advertisement appearing in a paper which is one of the principal exponents of the Dingley tariff in this country ought to receive some attention. While this advertisement was running, while this paper was taking the money of Mr. Keene for this advertisement, in its editorial columns they were talking about the Dingley tariff and insisting that it was inspired—every word and every syllable and every comma. Inasmuch as this advertisement in the New York Press first directed my serious attention to this subject, I desire to send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the article will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[The New York Press, Friday morning, February 2, 1906.]

FOR SALE—DIAMONDS, WATCHES, ETC.

Warning! Do not buy Waltham or Elgin watches from dealers allied with the trust!

When I started this campaign against the iniquitous methods practiced by the watch trust against both consumer and dealer I prophesied that the exposure of the combine's unfair methods would inevitably compel the watch trust to forego extorting extravagant profits from American watch buyers and compel them to get down to a square basis or to quit the foreign field. That alternative is now being considered by the watch trust.

The members of the watch trust are now studiously analyzing the problem created by the stupendous competition I have initiated—even the dealers are protesting against and rejecting the ironclad agreements heretofore forced upon them by the trust.

The cost of your watch may be a comparatively trivial affair, but the price you pay involves a principle, and a vital one.

To pay $75 for a Waltham "Riverside Maximus" (the price which eight out of ten dealers will ask you) may not be a willful extravagance from the standpoint of intrinsic value, but to pay $32.70 more than that particular watch sells for in England, Egypt, or Australia simply because it is a home-made article and you live in the United States is hardly sufficient justification for paying tribute and dividends to the trust. The average man wants fair play in watch buying as in other things.

There are no better watches made in the world than those turned out of our American factories. That fact is made doubly plain by the high character of the goods sent abroad by the watch trust to compete with the world-renowned watches of such makers as Sir John Bennett, Jules Jurgensen, Patek Phillipe, Audemar, Constantin & Vacheron, etc.

It may seem paradoxical or a "bull" to say that in order to get the best American-made watches at the lowest prices you must buy them abroad, but such is the fact, thanks to a benevolent "protective" tariff, which enables the watch trust to hold up the American public and demand tribute for dividends from Americans.

Here is an illustration of how the watch trust mulcts (or milks) the American watch buyer:

Walk into any jewelry store in the United States and ask to be shown the best Waltham watch made. They will show you the "Riverside Maximus," at $75.

Under no circumstances are they allowed to sell this watch for less than $60, as they are bound by the "ironclad" agreement with the trust to maintain that as the minimum price. I buy this same "Riverside Maximus" in England, defray all shipping expenses, bring it back to this country duty free, and offer it to the American public at $42.30, and make a reasonable trade profit on the transaction.

The same relative price difference applies to all other grades of Waltham and Elgin watches.

It is even possible to bring Waltham movements back to this country from England and retail them for $2.75 at a profit.

All my watches are guaranteed brand new, just as they come from the Waltham and Elgin factories. The prices are all under the market; for instance, the Riverside, seventeen jewels, price $16.39. No jeweler is allowed to sell this for less than $25, under penalty of being blacklisted by the trust cutting off his supply. Ask some jeweler and find out. All my prices represent about the same percentage of saving. The prices quoted below are for movements alone. On request I will submit prices on any sort of case made. I do not sell movements without cases or cases without movements. They are priced separately simply for the convenience of customers.

Waltham, Maximus, 23 jewels	$42.30
Waltham, 15 jewels, No. 820	3.98
Waltham, 17 jewels, No. 85	4.78
Waltham, Crescent St., 19 jewels	16.92
Waltham, Crescent St., 21 jewels	18.98
Waltham, Riverside, 17 jewels	16.39
Waltham, Vanguard, 23 jewels	25.38
P. S. Bartlett, 17 jewels	7.98
Elgin, B. W. Raymond, 19 jewels	16.92
Appleton, Tracy & Co., 17 jewels	11.98
Lady Waltham, 0 size, 16 jewels	9.98
Riverside, 12 size, 17 jewels	16.39
Waltham, Maximus, 21 jewels	39.98
Elgin, Veritas, 23 jewels	25.38

CHARLES A. KEENE,
180 Broadway, New York, Watches, Diamonds, Jewelry.

Mr. RAINEY. What is known as the "big four" in the watch trust are the following: The American Waltham Watch Company, of Waltham, Mass.; the Crescent Watch Case Company, of Philadelphia; the Elgin National Watch Company, of Elgin, Ill., and the Keystone Watch Case Company, of Newark, N. J. The Waltham company make movements only, and they are put on the market and sold in Crescent watch cases. The Elgin National Watch Company sell their watches to the Keystone Watch Case Company for export, and they are exported by the Keystone Watch Case Company. The New York Standard Watch Company, of Jersey City; the Philadelphia Watch Case Company, of Riverside, N. J., and the E. Howard Watch Company, of Boston, are controlled by the same capital that controls the Keystone company, and in order to show how closely all these watch companies are related I want simply to call attention to the fact that although the capital of the Keystone company controls the Howard Watch Company, the Howard watches are made by the Waltham factory in New York. All these companies own each other's stock.

Now, I want to answer the questions of the gentleman from Iowa. They are all pertinent and in fairness they ought to be answered, and inasmuch as he has asked them, coming as they do from a leading exponent of the "stand pat" Republican policy of this country, they ought to be answered fully, and if I do not entirely satisfy the gentleman from Iowa or any other gentleman on the other side of the House, I trust that you will keep on interrupting and asking questions until I have satisfied every one of you. I have been studying the watch business for some time now, and I feel that I know something about it and I am willing to give to you, who control the situation here and who alone can say whether or not there shall be a revision of the tariff schedules, the benefit of my labors. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Under the Dingley Act the following tariffs are imposed upon watches and upon watch movements. I read from section 191 of the tariff law of 1897.

Watch movements, whether imported in cases or not, if having not more than seven jewels, 35 cents each; if having more than seven jewels and not more than eleven jewels, 50 cents each; if having more than eleven jewels and not more than fifteen jewels, 75 cents each; if having more than fifteen jewels and not more than seventeen jewels, $1.25 each; if having more than seventeen jewels, $3 each, and in addition thereto, on all the foregoing, 25 per centum ad valorem; watch cases and parts of watches, including watch dials, chronometers, parts of watches, etc., 40 per centum ad valorem. All jewels for use in the manufacture of watches or clocks, 10 per centum ad valorem.

In other words, under the Dingley Act the tariff upon watch movements and upon watch cases, adding together the specific and the ad valorem duties, amount to nearly 50 per cent of their value. Now, in order to further answer the gentleman from Iowa upon a matter about which I am surprised he is not fully informed, I want to say that American-made goods sent abroad can be brought back without paying any duty if they come back in the same condition that they were in when they went abroad. You must satisfy the tariff officers, not that they are in the same condition perhaps, but that they have not been improved upon or advanced in value while abroad, and in that connection I want to send this letter to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 23, 1906.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
House of Representatives United States.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 20th instant, I have the honor to inform you that articles of American production or manufacture upon being reimported into the United States after exportation thereof are entitled to entry free of duty, under paragraph 483 of the tariff act of 1897. I inclose herewith copies of Department circulars Nos. 125 and 35, of October 19, 1899, and March 26, 1903, respectively, containing the regulations relative to the entry of such reimported American goods.

Respectfully,

H. A. TAYLOR, Acting Secretary.

Mr. RAINEY. Now, before proceeding further with the discussion of this question I want to show how the watch trust does business. I have here a contract which the American Waltham Watch Company exacts from every retailer in this country who buys the better grades of watches, and in watch parlance the better grades of watches are called "railroad movements." No dealer who buys a railroad movement in the United States is permitted to sell that movement for less than the minimum price fixed in that contract. Under this contract the Waltham Company exercises the right to control absolutely the men who shall be jobbers of watches in the United States. In order to show you how it is possible for this business to be built up back of this tariff—a nefarious, outrageous business like this—I am going to put the contract of the Waltham Company in the RECORD. It has never been published; and I am not permitted to give the name of the retail dealer who furnished me with this copy. But I propose that the country now shall know, and I ask the Clerk to read the contract at the bottom of this bill, beginning with the words, "Bill to retailers."

The Clerk read as follows:

BILL TO RETAILERS—CONDITIONS OF SALE.

Each Waltham railroad movement specified in this bill is sold subject to all the conditions hereinafter and in the Waltham contract notice accompanying such movement set forth, which conditions, the purchaser named herein, by the acceptance of such movement, agrees with the undersigned company to keep and perform, viz: (1) Retail watch dealers must not dispose of said movements except by sale; (2) must sell said movements only to customers purchasing the same for their own or others' use and not for resale; (3) and must not advertise or sell any of said movements or any other Waltham railroad movements at less than the following net prices, respectively:

Vanguard, twenty-three jewels, $35; Vanguard, twenty-one jewels, $30; Vanguard, nineteen jewels, $28; Crescent St., twenty-one jewels, $26; Crescent St., nineteen jewels, $24; Appleton, Tracy & Co. Premier, $21; Riverside Maximus Lever Setting, $60; Riverside Lever Setting, $25.

(4) All watch dealers handling these or any other Waltham railroad movements are to be considered retail dealers, except those named as jobbers in the latest list of jobbers issued by said company. (5) A breach of any of these conditions as to any Waltham railroad movement shall revest in said company the title of such movement and of all other Waltham railroad movements in the possession of the violator, and upon tendering the price paid by the holder of such movements the said company shall be entitled to retake possession of the same.

A duplicate of this bill has been sent to the undersigned, by whom these conditions will be enforced.

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY,
Waltham, Mass.

Mr. RAINEY. Now, I want to put in the RECORD, and I want to have it read here, the contract the Elgin company exacts from other companies, and this will be the first time this contract has ever been printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

RETAIL BILL.

The Elgin movements specified herein are sold subject to the following license conditions (see license accompanying each movement): (1) The retail purchaser may advertise and sell the same only to buyers for use, and at not less than the following prices: No. 214 Veritas, $35; 239 and 274 Veritas, $30; 240 Raymond, $24; Father Time, hunting or open face, $26; 17-jewel B. W. Raymond, hunting or open face, $21; 270, $28; 280, $23. (2) Acceptance of the movements is assent to these conditions. (3) Any violation of the license conditions revokes and terminates all right and license as to movements and all other Elgin movements in the violator's possession.

Mr. RAINEY. Under the contracts of the Waltham and the Elgin companies, a Crescent Street 21-jewel movement can not be sold to any retailer in the United States for a less price than $26. You can go into the store at 180 Broadway and buy that movement for $18.98. Under the minimum-price contract just read of the Waltham Company a Vanguard 23-jewel watch movement can not be sold by any retail dealer in the United States for a less price than $35. Mr. Keene, in the advertisement I had read just now from the Clerk's desk, agrees to sell this watch movement for $25.38. These movements can not be sold for less than this price. If you go into some store on a prominent thoroughfare in one of our large cities, where there is a display of diamonds on a black velvet background and a profusion of cut glass and immense plate-glass windows, they will charge you much more for a Crescent street 21-jewel Waltham movement than $26, but no retail dealer in the United States can sell it for less, and you can not buy it for less under the contract they exact from all of them and which I have just had read.

Under the contract I have had read no retail dealer can sell a Crescent Street 19-jewel Waltham movement for less than $24. In the advertisement from the New York Press, that I presented a while ago, Mr. Keene agrees to sell this watch, and does sell it, for $16.92—$8 less than any retail dealer can buy it for in the United States. Under the minimum contract price of the Waltham company, a Riverside Maximus movement can not be sold by any retail dealer in the United States for less than $60; and if you go into the store of some fashionable dealer, where they are paying a high rate of rent and handling and selling cut glass and diamonds, they will charge you from $75 to $100 for this movement. According to the advertisement I sent to the Clerk's desk, Mr. Keene agrees to sell a Riverside Maximus movement—and it is the best watch movement made in the United States, and perhaps in the world—for $42.30. Under the Waltham contract, a Riverside lever-setting movement can not be sold for less than $25, and in this advertisement Mr. Keene says he will sell it for $16.39.

Under that little contract the Elgin company exacts from all retailers in the country; they are not permitted to sell 214 Elgin Veritas watch movements for a less price than $35. As a matter of fact, most of them sell this movement for much more than that. None of them can sell it for less without forfeiting, under this contract, not only the particular grade of watches they are so selling, but their entire stock of Elgin watches. Mr. Keene sells it for $25.38, $10 cheaper than any retailer in the country is permitted to sell it.

Under the Elgin contract a 240 Raymond Elgin can not be sold for a less price than $24. If you try to buy that kind of movement you will find it oftener sells for more than $24 than for $24. But if you go into some little obscure store, on some out-of-the-way street, you will be able to buy this movement for $24, but not for any less. Mr. Keene's price on this movement is $16.39, as shown by his advertisement.

Now, all these watches——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption, for fear the country may think that the attention of the Republican majority in the House had never been called to this matter and that they have had no opportunity to remedy this evil by reducing this extortionate duty behind which is sheltered this trust, as claimed. I would like to get the gentleman's permission to read a brief bill of one sentence. On February 20, 1906—

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

It is still lying in that "stand-pat" Committee on Ways and Means.

A bill to reduce the duties on watches imported into the United States from foreign countries.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the duty levied, collected, and paid upon watches imported into the United States from foreign countries shall be 15 per cent ad valorem.

SEC. 2. That all provisions of the law in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Now, one word more, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me. The gentleman has told about this iniquitous trust contract which is made by these two companies; a similar contract is made by the sugar trust, and a similar contract is made by nearly all trusts. The gentleman from Mississippi, representing the minority on this side of the Chamber, December 21, 1905, introduced a bill which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where it seems likewise to "stand pat." That bill is a copy of the Massachusetts statute, and reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no person, firm, or corporation, or association of individuals, or association of corporations engaged in interstate commerce shall make it a condition of the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise that the purchaser shall not sell or deal in the goods, wares, or merchandise of any other person, firm, corporation, or association of natural or artificial persons: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to prohibit the appointment of agents or sole agents for the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise. Any violation of the provisions of this act shall be held to be a contract in restraint of trade among the several States under the provisions of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, and every person who shall be a party to said contract in violation of this act shall, on conviction thereof, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court, and shall be subject to such other penalties, forfeitures, and suits in equity and actions at law as are prescribed in sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 of an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890.

So the Republican party had opportunity to correct just exactly these two abuses which have furnished the occasion of this magnificent speech upon this glaring object lesson of national exploitation and outrage. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I wish to call the attention of the country also to the fact——

Mr. RAINEY. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will not the gentleman yield for the same purpose that he yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. RAINEY. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. You would not yield to the gentleman from Connecticut for the same purpose that you yielded to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman can speak in his own time. I am willing to yield for all questions that anybody wants to ask on this subject, and I will gladly answer every one of them, but I am not half through with my remarks.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Well, I will put it in the form of a question. Does the Democratic party when in power exercise the same policy in regard to the tariff that they do when they are out of power? I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi now suggests that the Democratic party would put a tariff of 15 per cent on watches, but when they were in power they made it 25 per cent. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me? I want to say that 15 per cent on watches now, with the improvements which have been taking place all the time in America in watch making, is a larger duty and a fuller duty in every respect than 25 per cent was then. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. LACEY. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. RAINEY. Very well.

Mr. LACEY. Isn't it a good deal easier to collect the 25 cents now than it was to collect 15 cents when the Democratic party made their tariff? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not if you have to live on the 25 cents. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, we are living now in the present among living issues and not among the issues of long ago. We are discussing issues of the present, and these are the issues that the country want you gentlemen of the other side to discuss; these are the issues they expect you to meet, and these are the issues you will have to meet this fall. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You can not meet them by calling attention to the schedules that have existed heretofore, whether they were Democratic or whether they were Republican schedules; but the country demands now upon these great questions action and they expect you to do something, and you may refuse to do it if you dare. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, all of these watches in this store at 180 Broadway have been reimported from England. Every one of them has been reimported. Why does not some gentleman ask me how I know it? Do you want to know how I know that? You do not seem to want to know, but I will tell you anyway. [Laughter.] Before this gentleman started that business, three or four months ago, although he had been in business in this place three or four years before he commenced to make a specialty of reimported American watches, he accumulated a stock of watches purchased abroad, paying for them at the export price over $130,000. How do I know that? You do not ask me how I know it, but you ought to ask. [Laughter.] I will tell you how I know it.

I hold in my hand over $130,000 of American Express Company's receipts showing that within the fifteen months prior to the time he started this particular business, he cabled abroad in American money over $130,000 through the American Express Company for the purpose of purchasing abroad American-made watches.

I can not put this mass of evidence in the RECORD, but I will say to you gentlemen, and I will say to the country, that I propose to keep this evidence here accessible to every one of you, so that you can verify my statement or not, and I challenge any one of you on that side to examine here, at any time in the next two or three weeks, these American Express Company's receipts and see whether or not the statement I have now made is not true. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's hour has expired.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is under the control of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman was given such time as he desired in which to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires to yield further, he may do so.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman such further time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, one hour.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether he intends that this hour shall continue to-morrow, or whether he desires the gentleman to conclude to-night? I do not intend to ask the gentleman to stop now. I ask him whether the gentleman would conclude to-night?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know whether I could conclude to-night or not. I would prefer to finish to-morrow, if I can have the time to-morrow.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Then I suggest that, with the understanding that the gentleman can have the floor when the committee goes into session to-morrow, that we now rise.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I think it would not be wise to extend an indefinite leave to the gentleman. That might consume all of the day.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I will not do that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I understood that an hour and a half was the time the gentleman would take for his argument.

Mr. RAINEY. I may get through in that time.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I understood that also, but he may take another hour.

Mr. RAINEY. I would like to have another hour. I will get through in an hour.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, to settle this controversy about the time, I yield to the gentleman one more hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman desires to proceed now.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to proceed in the morning, at the opening of the session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] states that he would prefer to proceed with his hour to-morrow morning.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I think we better proceed for a little while longer to-night.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it is time to quit now, or "take out," as Mr. Kilgore, of Texas, used to say, and if the gentleman is going to speak an hour he will not gain anything by fooling away a few minutes longer here to-night. He would rather finish the rest of his speech to-morrow, and I think he would get through more quickly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Oh, the gentleman does not want to keep us here all night.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, you better be looking at your watches now. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to proceed in the morning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] whether he can not move that the committee do now rise? The gentleman from Illinois can talk with much less fatigue to-morrow than he can now and can finish his remarks more satisfactorily to himself and better for the House. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that the committee do now rise.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that I was following what I understood was the definite arrangement between the gentleman from Illinois and myself. He told me that he wished to consume an hour and a half this afternoon. I suggest the gentleman proceed until, say, half past 5 and that then we rise, and that he then conclude his argument to-morrow morning. That was his own arrangement originally.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would not the gentleman from Illinois rather go ahead to-morrow morning?

Mr. RAINEY. I would rather go ahead to-morrow.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if he did not say to me that he wished to proceed for an hour and a half to-night?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; that is what I told the gentleman. I thought I would get through in an hour and a half.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That was the statement the gentleman made to me.

Mr. RAINEY. But I have been interrupted repeatedly by Members on the other side, and it has taken a great portion of my time to answer questions. I prefer to go ahead to-morrow morning. I think I can finish more quickly than by going on this afternoon.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Do I understand, then, that if we should rise now the gentleman from Illinois will conclude in an hour to-morrow?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; I will.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16953—the post-office appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4825. An act to provide for the construction of a bridge across Rainy River, in the State of Minnesota;

S. 5181. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Snake River between Whitman and Columbia counties, in the State of Washington; and

S. 4300. An act to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11026. An act to authorize the counties of Holmes and Washington to construct a bridge across Yazoo River, Mississippi.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 5059. An act to increase the limit of cost of the post-office at Yankton, S. Dak.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

UNITED STATES COURTS FOR ALABAMA.

The SPEAKER. The following House bill, the title of which the Clerk will report, will lie upon the table, a corresponding Senate bill having passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16802) to fix the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern division of the northern district of Alabama, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CHANEY was granted leave of absence until April 22, on account of important business.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a favorable recommendation as to the payment to the Santee Sioux and Ponca Indians in Nebraska of a share in the fund in the Treasury to the credit of the Sioux Indians—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation for repairs of the U. S. S. Bancroft for use as a revenue cutter—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in favor of the passage of the Philippine tariff bill. The resolutions are brief, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT. I will say to the Senator that I was just about to offer similar resolutions.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Philippines, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. Founded A. D. 1768.]

At the monthly meeting of the chamber of commerce, held April 5, 1906, the following preamble and resolutions, reported by its committee on foreign commerce and the revenue laws, were adopted:

Whereas the Committee on the Philippines of the Senate has, by a vote of eight to five, declined to report, even for consideration, the Philippine tariff bill; and

Whereas this bill, apart from its economic aspect, seems to this chamber to involve a principle that is vital to a colonial policy that is to be either wise or just, namely, the principle that a colony is to be administered in its own interest and not in the interest of the governing country; and

Whereas even in its economic aspect the effect of this bill upon the United States can be but slight, while its effect upon the Philippines may be advantageous in the highest degree: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York hereby urges upon the Committee on the Philippines of the Senate and upon the Senate prompt and favorable consideration of this important measure: And be it further

Resolved, That copies of these preambles and resolutions be transmitted to the appropriate authorities at Washington, and to kindred commercial bodies, with the request to the latter that they take similar action at an early day.

A true copy.

On motion of Mr. BURKETT, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of Senate bill 5511, providing for the control of grazing upon the public lands in the arid States and Territories of the United States.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I desire to approach the consideration and discussion of this most important subject in a spirit of fairness and impartiality, with a sincere purpose to do justice to all interests concerned, and above all to secure to the people a prompt and adequate remedy for the evils, injustices, abuses, and wrongs of every kind practiced by railroads, or in any way growing out of their operation.

I stand first for the interests of the people of my own State, which I am proud to represent in part on this floor, and after that for the interests of all the people of the United States. I have no interest that can affect my judgment or prevent me doing my duty as a Senator as I see it. My desire and highest purpose is to secure and serve the public interest.

Because of my supposed interest in railroads, it is charged and believed that I favor the railroad side of this question. This has been so often repeated that I am sure it will be pardonable if I say, in justice to myself, that my interest on the side of the shipper is ten times greater than on the side of the railroads, and that my interest in railroads is confined to those in my own State.

There is a pressing demand by the people for rate legislation that the highways of commerce be kept open on equal terms and alike to all, and that all wrongs and abuses on the part of railroads should stop.

The bill now under consideration, known as the Hepburn bill, reached the Senate in the form that it was reported to the House by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. No amendments were allowed in the House and none were allowed in the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, although there were many submitted to the committee by its members.

The duty now devolves upon the Senate to say whether there shall be amendments to the bill, and to what extent. It is the opinion of many Senators who have given the subject careful consideration that the bill should be amended and in a way that will remove doubts as to its constitutionality and make its provisions clearer and stronger in the direction of affording remedies for existing abuses. I favor heartily the objects and purposes of the bill and I will vote for it, but I want to make it better and stronger.

My chief objection to the bill is that it does not go far enough. It makes no attempt to provide remedies for many existing abuses by railroads. If the bill becomes a law without amendment it will disappoint the people, and they will justly cry out against Congress for not doing its duty, especially against those now most vehement in their denunciation of railroads and their unjust practices, and still refuse to put anything in the bill to correct them.

I believe in rate regulation of interstate commerce by Congress in the interest of the people. I believe Congress has the power to fix rates of interstate carriers, and can authorize, under proper restrictions, a subordinate tribunal to carry out its will in this regard.

I believe in the right of review by the courts of any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission affecting the rights and interests of carriers, shippers, and localities alike, and in the right to suspend the order of the Commission by the court upon a proper showing; but this suspension to be allowed only upon the condition that the rights and interests of the shipper shall be absolutely safeguarded by requiring a deposit of money in the court pending the suspension, to be paid to the shipper in case the court sustains the order of the Commission reducing the rate. Railway corporations are mere creatures of the law and exist by the will and consent of the people and in the interest of the people; I believe interstate carriers should be prohibited from transacting any other business than carrying freight and passengers and from doing any business in competition with shippers; that they should make a fair distribution of cars, put in upon reasonable terms necessary switches and sidings to accommodate the needs of shippers, and promptly make connections and fair and just prorating arrangements with branch and lateral lines. The time has come when the people demand that railroads shall be law-abiding.

I am in hearty accord with the President in his position on the subject of rate regulation and his desire to secure to the people correction of all abuses by railroads.

And in his message to the present Congress he says:

> Above all else, we must strive to keep the highways of commerce open to all on equal terms.
> * * * * * * *

In my judgment the most important legislative act now needed as regards the regulation of corporations is the act to confer on the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise rates and regulations, the revised rate to at once go into effect, and to stay in effect unless and until the court of review reverses it.

And in his message to the present Congress he says:

> In my judgment the most important provision which such law should contain is that conferring upon some competent administrative body the power to decide, upon the case being brought before it, whether a given rate prescribed by a railroad is reasonable and just, and if it is found to be unreasonable and unjust then, after full investigation of the complaint, to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the maximum reasonable rate, as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts.

No words could be more forceful, clearer, or more direct than those used by the Chief Executive just quoted.

SUBSTITUTE BILL.

After giving the subject my best thought, I prepared a bill embodying, as I think, the demands of the people and the ideas of the President on the subject of rate legislation, and have offered this bill (S. 4382), with some changes, as a substitute for the bill now under consideration.

The first four sections of this substitute deal with the rate question.

Briefly, the substitute provides that whenever any rate, fare, charge, or regulation established by any common carrier shall be unjust or unreasonable, or otherwise contrary to law, the Commission, after hearing, shall have power to make an order directing the carrier to modify the same in the manner and extent to be specified therein; and if the modification requires the change of any rate, fare, or charge, the order shall specify the maximum rate to be put in force by the carrier in lieu of that found by the Commission to be unjust, unreasonable, and otherwise contrary to law. It is provided further that—

> The Commission shall not have power to modify any rate, fare, or regulation established by a carrier or carriers to a greater extent than shall be necessary in order to remove the injustice, unreasonableness, or other unlawfulness thereof.

Then follows the clause prescribing a review of the orders of the Commission by the courts, and in case the court suspends such orders during the pendency of the suit to set them aside it shall do so only upon the condition that the carrier deposit in court such sum of money as may be necessary to protect the shipper and to be paid to him in case the order of the Commission changing the rate is sustained.

The remedy afforded in the first three sections of this substitute embodies clearly, definitely, and logically the ideas of the President and the demands of the people, as I understand them, and in a way that escapes all constitutional objections. It provides, in a constitutional way, for a review by the courts on behalf of any shipper, carrier, or locality affected, of the orders of the Commission and for a suspension of the same pending the suit for review.

The alternate remedy provided in the fourth section, which the Commission can pursue or not in its discretion, has the merit of expedition, does away with the delay incident to a long hearing before the Commission, taking sometimes more than a year. This time is saved to the shipper. Under this section the Commission at the cost of the United States can go immediately to the courts on complaint or on its own motion and institute a suit to enjoin any excessive or unlawful rate or unjust practice on the part of the carrier, the case can be advanced. If the court decides the rate is excessive and enjoins the carrier from charging the same it then orders the carrier within a short time to make a substitute rate, the same to be approved by the Commission, and if the carrier refuses or fails to make such substitute rate, then the Commission is authorized to make the rate, unless upon review by the courts the order should be set aside or modified.

The carrier, with all the facts before him and the decision of the court to instruct him, would hardly fail to make a proper rate and one that would be approved by the Commission. If he should fail to do so, then the Commission makes the rate.

No constitutional question can be raised under this substitute; there are no doubtful provisions that make it difficult to understand and construe. It provides remedies for existing abuses and evils that should be corrected and about which there are just complaints.

It will be observed that the Commission is not authorized under the substitute to fix the rate for the future because this power belongs to Congress and can not be delegated; but it is authorized to modify the rate made by the carrier to the extent and so far as may be necessary to remove the injustice, unreasonableness, or unlawfulness thereof and no further. Whether the Commission does this or not becomes a judicial question.

OMISSIONS OF PROVISIONS IN THE HEPBURN BILL TO CORRECT ABUSES.

I desire now to bring to the attention of the Senate what I consider omissions of necessary provisions in the Hepburn bill, and discuss the same from a practical and legal standpoint.

The main purpose of the Hepburn bill, among other things, is to provide a more efficient remedy against excessive rates in which all agree. I regret to say, however, that there are evils, injustices, and abuses by railroads for which the bill does not even attempt to provide a remedy. It makes no provision:

First. To prevent interstate carriers producing, mining, and selling coal, iron ore, and other products which they transport in competition with shippers, thereby oppressing and driving out of business the independent operator and absorbing his business.

Second. To oblige interstate carriers, on application of shippers of interstate commerce, to put in when needed, upon reasonable terms, switches to enable such shippers to get their products to market. There are instances where shippers have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in equipping mines and mills to do business, and railroads have denied them switches and connections.

Third. To compel interstate roads to make prompt and suitable connections with connecting branch and lateral lines, as well as just, fair, and reasonable prorating arrangements with the same and allowances for originating freight.

Fourth. To require interstate carriers to make a fair and just distribution of cars among shippers on their lines.

These four omissions and, I may say, abuses on the part of the railroad have aroused public sentiment almost to an alarming degree in West Virginia, and the chief objection of her people to the bill is that no remedy whatever is prescribed in the bill to correct all or any one of these abuses.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is three or four years, I think, since the Senator brought in a bill from the Interstate Commerce Committee, of which he is chairman, which was declared at the time and supposed to be for the purpose of remedying all evils attending the railroad situation. Did the Senator know then that these abuses of which he speaks and which are now so glaring were in existence? If not, how long since has this condition of coal monopoly and coal production been in existence in West Virginia?

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, some of them were known, but they were not so accentuated as they are now; besides, the bill the Senator refers to was more particularly aimed at correcting rebates and discriminations.

The people are entitled to protection against these abuses, which exist generally and work so much injustice to shippers and independent operators, especially in the State of West Virginia. And I will say, by the way, that there is no argument in the Senator's question. Because evils and abuses exist and have not been corrected heretofore furnishes no reason why they should not be corrected now. If the Senator goes much further, Mr. President, I shall think he is on the side of the railroads.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. ELKINS. I must proceed. I have a long speech, and I am sure the Senator wants to hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator will not throw a rock and cut me off from the opportunity of even catching it.

Mr. ELKINS. Later on I will give the Senator ample opportunity to put his question.

The people demand absolute protection against excessive rates, but there is little complaint on this score. What they complain of most and what they desire Congress to do is to provide adequate remedies for the correction of abuses I have mentioned and others that might be named.

As to all these abuses the bill is silent. It may be said that the States should legislate to correct these evils. In the State of West Virginia, and nearly all the States, there has been legislation on these subjects, but for many reasons the law is not invoked. In the first place, a shipper, single handed and alone, can not afford to sue a great interstate railroad; in doing so he is bound to incur large expense, great delay, and is sure to incur the hostility of the great through line, which may work irreparable injury to his interests.

I have introduced amendments covering these omissions in the bill and sincerely hope they will be adopted by the Senate. Nothing short of their adoption and becoming law will satisfy the shippers, independent operators, and the people generally of my State.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope I will not interrupt the flow of the Senator's thought, but——

Mr. ELKINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think I will bring out the Senator's position even more clearly than the Senator has brought it out by the question I put. Is it the opinion of the Senator that to regulate the evils the country is laboring under from railroad practices the bill reported from the committee is not nearly drastic enough for the Senator?

Mr. ELKINS. Is that your question?

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the Senator want a more far-reaching and more comprehensive bill, so as to eliminate more of the evils than are reached in that measure?

Mr. ELKINS. In reply to the Senator I will state that I do. I have said that the bill, though containing many excellent provisions, does not go far enough: that as to these omissions and abuses I have named it is silent and does not attempt to provide any remedy whatever.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will suggest that I do not believe the Senate is giving very close attention to that part of the Senator's speech. I was attracted by it, and I should like the Senator to repeat in what respect, in his opinion, the measure now before the Senate is not drastic enough and what evils it does not reach.

Mr. ELKINS. I have just named four omissions in the bill: First, the interstate railroads do not put in switches and sidings upon a reasonable request from the shippers to enable them to do their business; secondly, they do not make connections with branch or lateral lines and prorating arrangements, so that the branch line can live and shippers on those lines ship their products to market. They do not provide a fair distribution of cars. There is no provision in the bill to correct these abuses. Another thing is that there is nothing in this bill to prohibit a railroad from owning, mining, and selling coal in opposition to shippers.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will permit me, does he have an amendment which will compel the proper distribution of cars?

Mr. ELKINS. I have amendments covering all these points.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am sure there are a number of Senators here who would be glad to see how the Senator would secure what he thinks could be an equal or proper distribution of cars.

Mr. ELKINS. It is a most difficult question, but I have tried to put it in proper shape in one of my amendments.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Indiana that the Supreme Court has recently decided that there is power under the so-called "Elkins law" to enforce a distribution of cars among operators that will be fair and just. Suit was brought in the State of the Senator from West Virginia for a mandamus to compel the furnishing of cars on a just basis to operators who were complaining that they could not get a just distribution of cars, and the relief was granted.

Mr. SPOONER. The proceeding for mandamus was authorized by existing law.

Mr. FORAKER. By existing law, and so far as the distribution of cars is concerned there is legislation on the statute books now that is efficient to correct that evil, as in the past it has been an evil; but for a number of years past there has been no occasion for anybody to suffer in that way who saw fit to resort to the courts for redress.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator from Ohio is slightly mistaken.

Mr. PERKINS. With the permission of the Senator from West Virginia, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if under the present bill as presented from the committee the Interstate Commerce Commissioners have the right to route freight over any line of road the shipper may designate.

Mr. ELKINS. There is nothing in the bill on that subject.

Now, let me answer the Senator from Ohio. The Supreme Court has not decided that question, but the circuit court of the United States, Judge Goff rendering the opinion, and the circuit court of appeals have done so.

Mr. FORAKER. It was decided in the circuit court and also in the circuit court of appeals, with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court as the presiding judge in the court of appeals.

Mr. ELKINS. But that is not the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. I was in error in that respect; I was confusing that case with the recent Chesapeake and Ohio case, but it is now pending in the Supreme Court, and I do not think, in view of the two decisions below, that the decision is likely to be reversed.

Mr. ELKINS. This decision was rendered in West Virginia, and in the circuit court of appeals, and the court found power enough in what is known as the Elkins law to compel a fair distribution of cars by preventing discrimination which would work an unfair distribution of cars. That is the only case that has arisen under that law as yet, but there is no mention of distribution of cars nor anything like it in the Hepburn bill. That is the point I want to make.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks that existing law or any that could be devised could compel what the shipper himself would think to be a proper distribution of cars? As to the mandamus proceeding mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Ohio, of course that is reasonably clear, but even that would not and could not secure the distribution of cars to meet an emergency such as occurs in the shipment of meats or fruits that are spoiling, or something of that kind. That is one of the little items of this great complicated problem which has, of course, attracted the attention of everyone, and particularly my attention, in such little study as I have given it. I should be glad to have the Senator from West Virginia, who is an expert upon this matter, say how any law could be devised that will secure a proper distribution of cars in the opinion of the shipper?

Mr. ELKINS. In the opinion of the shipper, I do not think Congress could so frame a law that compliance with it would satisfy every shipper. Shippers can hardly ever get enough cars, especially when there is a demand for coal and coke. If shippers could get all the cars they wanted, then the market would soon be glutted—the supply would become greater than the demand and the price of coal go down—perhaps it would not be a good thing to give all the shippers all the cars they might want all the time. The railroads could not do it; they don't have enough cars to go around, and if they did the market would be congested and prices fall, but there should be no discrimination in the distribution of cars.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad the Senator has reconsidered and has let in others, and I would like to trespass on his patience for a moment.

Mr. ELKINS. It was not my intention to let anybody in, but the discussion seemed to be so interesting on these points that I was almost compelled to yield. I will yield to the Senator with great pleasure; he is on the committee and in charge of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia, or the Senator from Ohio, or the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. ELKINS. Will the Senator allow me to answer the question, as I have the floor?

Mr. TILLMAN. All right. I wish to ask anyone who is able to answer, how long it will take by this method of procedure in the courts to get relief on the question of the distribution of cars by a mandamus proceeding after a hearing before the district court or the circuit court and then before the court of appeals, and then on to the Supreme Court? I just want to know what time it will occupy. I think the Senator from West Virginia is entirely correct in saying there is nothing in the Hepburn bill which will reach this abuse.

Mr. ELKINS. There is nothing in the Hepburn bill. Under existing law the right to advance a case is given and it would not take so long. In the case that came up from West Virginia it was a very short suit, and it reached the circuit court of appeals in due season, and the railroads were satisfied with the judgment of the court in its decree as to the distribution of cars.

Now, to reply more definitely to the Senator from Indiana, as I said, it is a very difficult thing to provide in the bill for a fair distribution of cars. We can have the wording that upon a reasonable request or upon request the carriers shall furnish cars and distribute them fairly and justly among shippers. Then there is a provision in the Hepburn bill that makes it an offense not to carry out any of the provisions of the act. That leaves it to the Commission to say what is a fair distribution of cars. I do not think that you can probably go any further than that. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] asks how long it will take. We ought to have a remedy even if it does take a long time. Is not that better than not to have any remedy at all? As his bill fails to provide any remedy whatever I do no know what he is complaining about. He does not want any law or he objects to a law that allows a long time. Now, if the Senator from South Carolina stands by his bill, then he does not want any law.

Mr TILLMAN. This is the Hepburn bill. I am only in charge of it. It is not my bill. I do not want you to try to put any paternity of that sort upon me.

Mr. ELKINS. You have its paternity fastened on you, whether you consent or not.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not speaking of any disgrace that attaches at all, because there is some effort to do something for the people. I repudiate any assumption that there is any disgrace in trying to help to get a reasonable railroad-rate bill. But I want to ask the Senator whether he does not consider that if we could by some machinery of the courts or the law prevent railroads from engaging in producing coal and other things, would there be any row or any complaint about not furnishing cars? If the carrier was confined to the business of transportation, would he not be anxious to furnish all the cars that anybody would load for him, because that would be his occupation and his income would depend upon the amount of traffic?

Mr. ELKINS. I will reply to the Senator that I have another amendment here meeting this very point in order to facilitate and to help out the people that he seems always to have in his particular keeping. The Senator takes the dear people out of his vest pocket every morning and puts them down on his desk and says, "Dear things, I will have charge of you and not allow the bad corporations and railroads to get you this day of our Lord." Then he puts the dear people back in his pocket, to be securely kept over night, and says, "Now, I have done my duty." Nobody looks after the people.

Now, Mr. President, I am trying to look after the people just as much as the Senator. I have just as much interest in them and love them just as much as he does, and so does every other Senator on this floor. I am trying in what I have to say to suggest means in his bill to guard and protect the rights of the people, and I want his able cooperation to provide proper remedies. One of my amendments goes right to that point, that the carrier shall be confined to doing the business for which it is incorporated, namely, to transport freight and passengers and do no other business, and, as the Senator has said, that would be very helpful in the line of securing a fair distribution of cars.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has grown facetious at my expense. He talks about my taking the dear people out of my vest pocket every morning and then saying to the dear people, "I am going to take care of you," and all that kind of thing. I hope the Senator is not disgruntled because the dear people who voted for him, under a misconception possibly, have been sending me petitions which they would not send to him.

Mr. ELKINS. There is no argument in the world in that. The Senator can have all the petitions and all the letters he wants to print in the RECORD, if that pleases him, but I protest against the Senator constantly assuming that he has a monopoly of caring for the people's interests all the time, everywhere, and on every occasion, and no other Senator has any interest in the people, declaring often, in substance, "I am the blunt, plain, rugged, and honest Senator, and take care of the people." Now, every Senator wants a reasonable share in taking care of the public interests and the interests of the people, and I hope the Senator will not forget in his zeal that other Senators care for the people quite as much as he does.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I think I have given the Senator enough time.

Mr. TILLMAN. If you want to shut me off——

Mr. ELKINS. It will take me some time to finish, even without further interruptions.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ELKINS. I never will finish if these interruptions go on.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am going to ask the Senator a question on only one point, and he might still suggest another matter in which the bill is deficient. There have been a great many complaints made that meat packers, for instance, who own their own cars, are able to receive such a large rental for the use of those cars that it amounts to a rebate. Now, is there anything in this bill that prevents the railway company from paying these great packing houses such an excessive rental for the use of their special cars as will in effect amount to a good rebate every year?

Mr. ELKINS. I think this bill does meet that question, and

I think existing law does, if it does not. I think that is a discrimination that is already prohibited and punishable.

Mr. McCUMBER. Where?

Mr. ELKINS. The Elkins law, I think, does it. Besides, I think this is safeguarded in the first section and in the second amendment, near the top of page 3, where it defines transportation and what it includes. I think you will find enough authority there; but under the general proposition in the existing law there is power to prevent this discrimination, in my judgment. I did not refer to this omission, because I thought it was covered fully by existing law and partly in the Hepburn bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say to the Senator that the provision on page 3 does not state what the railway company shall pay for the use of the cars, nor is there a limitation. It is simply a question as to what it may charge the public, and it pays it indirectly.

Mr. ELKINS. But the Commission will have control of all the things mentioned, and the bill puts them under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if under their control they have the right to regulate them in the first instance, and if there is any discrimination or rebate given there this is already prohibited and punished by law.

The Supreme Court of the United States has recently intimated that an interstate carrier could not engage in the business of selling coal. This decision would seem to cover one of my amendments, yet I feel it would be well to incorporate this amendment in the law, and hereafter plainly prohibit railroads from engaging in any other business than that of transportation of freight and passengers to follow the suggestions of the Supreme Court.

The most important amendment is the one providing that interstate lines shall make prompt connections with connecting branch or lateral lines, and fair, just, and reasonable prorating arrangements with them. It can hardly be hoped that another trunk line will be built to New York, Boston, Philadelphia, or Baltimore. Entrance into these cities by another trunk line is almost impossible. The cost and obstacles to be overcome make it prohibitory. In a less degree the same might be said of the great cities of the Union, especially Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, and Cincinnati. The people must, therefore, in the future depend largely for the further development of the country and continued increase in business upon short lines of railroad reaching rich sections. This is especially the case in the great State of West Virginia, one of the richest in the Union.

Unless the interstate railroads, reaching all the large cities and markets, make fair connecting and prorating arrangements with branch and lateral lines, the business and development of the country must be retarded. These great railroads already have immediately along their lines all the business they can do at present, and they hold that no one else should build necessary branch and lateral lines in what they term their territory. That is the assumption of these great lines, that it is "their territory," and if anyone attempts to build a branch or lateral line it is an invasion of this territory. There are many men who can build 10, 20, 50, or 100 miles of railroad to connect with interstate lines who could not possibly build a trunk line.

In the State of West Virginia and other States there are many men who have made large investments in agricultural, coal, timber, iron-ore, and other lands who are able and desirous of building short lines from 10 to 100 miles long to reach these lands and find a market for their products, but they will not build them under present conditions because of the difficulties in the way of getting switches and connections with the interstate lines, and, when they do get them, securing fair treatment. Men can not afford to take this risk without the law guarantees them protection, and the people look to Congress to provide this protection in the bill under consideration.

As matters now stand it is in the power of the great through lines to largely prevent the building of branch or lateral lines or to utterly crush them out when built or make them unprofitable. If there is not a provision in this bill compelling connections and fair treatment to short lines, the certain result will be that people who have made investments in lands will lose their money, fewer railroads will be built, and there will be less business and less development of the resources of the country.

Railways are entitled to all the protection under the law that other property enjoys. No well-minded citizen wishes to make war on railroads; an injury to the railroads would be an injury to the country; but the great lines should not be permitted to absorb the transportation of the country, prevent smaller lines being built, impair large investments, and compel rich sections of the country to remain undeveloped.

HEPBURN BILL EMPOWERS COMMISSION TO FIX RATES BETWEEN LOCALITIES.

All agree that the power to fix rates between localities should not be conferred on the Commission for many and obvious reasons. I refer to this because there is a marked difference of opinion among Senators on this point. It is claimed by the able Senators who helped to formulate and draft this bill that this power is not conferred, and that it would be dangerous if conferred. My purpose is to show that it is conferred, and I agree that it is dangerous. It would place in the hands of five or seven men the power to impair the growth of one section of the country and build up another. Railroads are vitally interested in building up communities and localities which they reach and serve; their interests are mutual and there should be no antagonism between them. All things being equal, carriers are prosperous just as communities on their lines flourish. A railroad can not prosper by oppressing localities on its line; therefore railroads can better adjust rate differences between communities on different lines than a Commission, they can give and take in a contest about rates; there is an elasticity in the operation of railroads by their officers and employees that the Commission does not and can not possess. If a railroad attempts to favor a particular city or locality on one line against a city or locality on the other line, the power railroads have of lowering or advancing rates can compel consideration and attention to the complaints of the injured community and in the end it can get a fair adjustment, and generally does. Railroad rates, like water, seek a level, an equilibrium, which in the end, sooner or later, brings substantial justice and satisfaction to the public.

The differentials that now exist on the Atlantic seaboard are the result of a contest of a quarter of a century, largely between communities, and at times, railroads. A commission never could reach the result worked out by railroads, because it only has the power to reduce rates, and in dealing with differentials in order to get an adjustment it has to cut down and never can advance the rate. If it lowers the rate from Chicago to New York, then it must do the same to Philadelphia and Baltimore.

Differentials concern communities more than they do railroads, and communities, through their boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and commercial organizations, take an active interest whenever there is a proposed change in rates. In the case of differentials between New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Baltimore submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission as arbitrators and lately decided, the railroads were almost passive, while the boards of trade and chambers of commerce of the respective cities conducted the arguments. They seemed much more interested than the railroads. It is a remarkable fact that after the hearing and consideration of this case for months by the Commission there was no substantial change in the adjustment of the differentials made by the railroads.

The power conferred upon the Commission by the bill that whenever it finds any regulation or practice whatsoever of such carrier or carriers affecting rates unjust or unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, it is to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be a "just and reasonable rate or rates, charge or charges," to be thereafter observed, and what regulation or practice is just, fair, and reasonable to be thereafter followed, unquestionably gives the power to the Commission to fix and determine rates between localities. Under the words "regulation or practice" the Commission might determine largely how railroads should be run and operated.

While it is claimed that the Hepburn bill does not give the Commission discretionary power to revise or prescribe differentials or to readjust the relative commercial location of competing cities, it is very clear that the bill does confer such power. But more than this the bill, as well as all others, necessarily vests in the Commission the power to prescribe rates in terms of other rates, thus prescribing differentials which will be automatic in their operation.

For example, the rate from New York to Chicago on first-class freight is 75 cents per 100 pounds. On first-class freight the rate from New York to St. Louis is 116 per cent of the New York-Chicago rate.

Allow me to explain just here that the New York-Chicago rate is made the basis of the rates this side of the Mississippi River, and the rates to the various cities are percentages above and below the New York-Chicago rate. For instance, East St. Louis is 116 per cent. Then it takes 2 cents per hundred pounds on first-class freight to get across the bridge and into the city. To Cincinnati it is 85 cents; in Detroit, 60 cents, and to Pittsburg, 50 cents—I mean of the New York-Chicago rate—and the Pittsburg rates govern all the points in my State west of the mountains. If the Commission lowers the percentage of the New York-Chicago rate to Cincinnati, say, 9 per cent, that would absolutely affect the rates between Chicago and Cincinnati and New York and Cincinnati, and it can not be avoided.

Suppose a man has an iron or steel plant in Cincinnati and ships to New York. The very moment you lower that rate 9 per cent, I mean of the Chicago-New York rate, the Detroit man, who has a similar factory, complains and says: "I can not get to New York on my rate and compete; I established my factory here on a certain percentage rate. I built my plant on this rate, and I can not permit this, because I can not compete, and I must have a lower rate or go out of business." Now, what does this bring about? It brings about the very thing deprecated by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] in his very eloquent periods describing the antagonism and war between cities and localities that would follow if the Commission should have the power to fix rates between localities. I could amplify this. The Peoria rate is the Missouri River rate; and see what a far-reaching thing it is to disturb that rate. The Ohio River and the Missouri River rates include nearly all the rates in the Middle West and upon the Atlantic seaboard, or they are affected by any change that may be made.

But, Mr. President, to proceed with the St. Louis differential, where I was interrupted.

The 16 per cent constitutes the differential of St. Louis over Chicago. It is open to jobbers in St. Louis to complain that this differential is unduly prejudicial to St. Louis. Under the Hepburn bill it is in the power of the Commission, if it finds the rate to St. Louis unduly prejudicial as compared with the rate to Chicago, to prescribe a maximum rate to St. Louis. It is not necessary for the Commission to prescribe this rate in figures independent of other rates. One of the most usual ways in determining rates is to describe them in terms of percentage of other rates; therefore the Commission, if it agrees with the St. Louis jobbers, can provide that the maximum rate from New York to St. Louis shall be not more than 105 per cent of the rate from New York to Chicago. Any subsequent reduction in the rate from New York to Chicago will automatically reduce the rate from New York to St. Louis, so as to preserve the new differential of 5 per cent thus established by the Commission.

You see, if you change the New York-Chicago rate to 70 cents, the East St. Louis rate would still be 105 per cent of that rate.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the Senator to ask him a question on that point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand that the Hepburn bill, or the amendments to that bill, change existing law on that subject? Is it not true now under existing law that that question can be raised, if it can be raised, under this bill? I have endeavored to ascertain what changes have been made in the pending bill in that respect, but I do not find that the law on that subject is changed in any way by this proposed amendment of the statutes. In other words, if this bill authorizes the Commission to deal with these questions they have that authority now, and this bill does not change it.

Mr. ELKINS. I think the Senator has misapprehended the law, if I understand it. Of course I say this with due deference to the Senator. This question was raised in the Maximum Rate case, and the court would not allow the Commission to do that very thing—I mean fix the rates between localities—and under this bill, without a right to review, and the right expressly given to change any rule or regulation affecting rates, the power, to my mind, is clearly conferred on the Commission to fix rates between localities.

The Maximum Rate case stopped the change of ninety-six rates, I believe it was, because the court decided the power was not in the Commission to enforce its orders and make these rates; but if the right of review is not allowed the courts, then the Commission can fix them.

I think the Senator will find, on a more careful examination of the bill, that the existing law will be changed to that extent. At least, that is the way I understand it.

If the power to prescribe practices is constitutional, then, in all probability, that power would in itself give the Commission far-reaching power over the question of differentials and relative rates. An established custom of the railroads to allow Philadelphia a differential of 2 cents under New York on business from Chicago is, in one entirely natural sense, a "practice affecting rates."

There is where this power is again conferred. The Commission might, therefore, claim with success that it could prescribe a new "practice affecting rates" by ordering a new differential to be observed. I think that is a full answer. This undoubtedly confers on the Commission the power to determine and fix the rates between localities. Then, again, the bill confers power on the Commission to fix rates between localities by further providing that the Commission may inquire into the violation of any of the provisions of this act.

That is section 3 of the old act. If this bill should become a law, then it will be all one law. Now, let us see what section 3 says:

> That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic.

Here the power is expressly given to set aside any preference or advantage given to any locality, and fix the rates to such locality, and while the bill attempts but fails to give the carrier the right of review by the courts it denies it to the shipper and localities. There should be a definite provision in the bill denying the power to a commission to fix rates between localities on different lines and the right given any shipper or locality that may be affected by any order of the Commission to a review by the courts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator just quoting from the law?

Mr. ELKINS. Those are my words. I have read section 3. I think those two provisions clearly establish the right under this law to fix rates between localities. I believe even the framers of the bill themselves deprecate this; and all agree that we can not confer upon any tribunal in the world this right, because, if we did, what would happen? Very soon there would be trouble between cities, then communities, and then between sections—the very thing all seem to wish to avoid. We are in great danger if this power is conferred of getting, say, the Pacific coast and the South Atlantic States into antagonism and trouble of a most serious kind. This is a most delicate matter. You touch one of these determining rates and everything is instantly in confusion. If you disturb the cotton rate from New England, you affect the cotton rate from the South, and I might go on with all the rates from basing points.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ELKINS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that point, Mr. President, I will ask the Senator what he thinks of an amendment which I have proposed and had printed, which reads as follows:

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing the Commission to hear any complaint based upon an alleged preference given to one locality over another, nor to set aside or substitute any rate because of any alleged preference of one locality over another.

Mr. ELKINS. I think that might do. I would have offered an amendment on this point, but I have proposed so many amendments that I hesitated.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, the point he is just now touching is one of the essential features of this bill; and I am very glad, for one, to have his view upon that subject. As I understand, the promoters of this bill state that these changes apply only to the line with reference to which the complaint is made, and that they absolutely exclude the idea of dealing with questions as respects competing lines. If that be true, then the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] partially covers it. I think I might suggest another amendment that would aid in that regard; I will not do it now, but I consider that one of the questions we should have clearly understood and defined in this bill is whether or not the power of this Commission is to be extended beyond the power they now have either directly or impliedly. I am very glad to have the Senator call attention to that subject.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] if he favors putting into this bill a prohibition against the consideration of relative rates? I mean relative as to localities. Did I understand the Senator from Iowa to so state?

Mr. ALLISON. Just at this moment——

Mr. BACON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that when he turns his face in the other direction those of us on this side can not hear him, and we desire to do so.

Mr. ALLISON. I will address myself to the Chair.

I will say just at this moment that I do not wish to commit myself—I hope the Senator understands that—as respects this particular feature of the bill; but I repeat that I regard it as one of the most important provisions of this bill. What we do mean should be settled clearly and distinctly, if it is not now settled clearly and distinctly.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I will say one word more. My impression is at the moment, before I hear the debate further, that if it is not clearly provided for in this bill the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire ought to be dealt with, and in some form should be embodied in the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. I regret that the Senator is not prepared to give us a positive statement as to his position in regard to this extremely important question. It is one of the most important questions connected with all this legislation. My home happens to be in Cincinnati. It is an acute question there, and has been for years. I was disappointed, as I know the shippers of that community must have been, when they read in the report made by the House committee on the Hepburn bill that they had not undertaken to deal with that question, but had postponed it for some future time, when they would give further consideration to the subject. Now, let me state to the Senator from Iowa what our difficulty is, and then he will understand why legislation that does not deal with that question can not do us any good.

The city of Cincinnati, speaking in round numbers, is about 400 miles distant from Atlanta. The city of New York, I will say, in round numbers, is something like 800 miles distant from Atlanta, but the roads from New York to Atlanta give practically as cheap rates as the rates that are given by roads from Cincinnati to Atlanta, only half the distance. The contention of the people of Cincinnati is not that the rates from Cincinnati to Atlanta are in and of themselves too high, but that they are relatively too high; that it is a discrimination against Cincinnati to take goods into Atlanta or other points in the South twice the distance at practically the same rate. It is against that sort of discrimination, as it is claimed it is, that the people of the community in which I live have been trying to get some relief.

If we are to be told that this bill does not meet that case, and that to make it doubly sure that it shall not and can not be construed to meet it, we are to put another amendment in it such as the Senator from New Hampshire proposes, I think there will be widespread disappointment, not only in that community, but in every other community, and there are perhaps thousands of them that are making similar complaints. I do not ask the Senator to answer now, for it is a troublesome question, and I can understand why he wants to answer it in a guarded way. It is a question that has given us all great difficulty; it is complicated, and it is hard to meet; but I want to invite the Senator's attention to it as one of the practical questions and to ask him to consider it, so that when we come to vote we can intelligently act upon that proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, just one moment——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ELKINS. I do for just one moment.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] has a different view of what ought to be in this bill from the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and therefore I think he must not reflect upon me because I have not been able, in the conflicting views of Senators who are friendly to this measure and who want to secure effective legislation, from the investigation I have been able to make to ascertain certainly what ought to be done with reference to this most complicated provision in this bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Iowa will not think I was trying to reflect upon him. I was only directing his attention to the matter, and I said I was not surprised that he was not able to give a positive statement as to what his attitude may happen to be after he hears the discussion. It is true that I do not agree with other Senators exactly as to what should be in this bill; but I want to say here, taking opportunity now while this is in the minds of Senators, that neither in this bill, nor in any other bill of this kind that can be framed, can you legislate so as to cure that evil. In the House they purposely omitted to put in a provision, out of the many that had been offered for that purpose, to cure it, and acknowledged in their report that they had passed it over without undertaking to deal with it. I have a measure that does deal with it, and I can satisfy the Senator from Iowa, I think, that under the amendment of the Elkins law which I have proposed we can meet and deal with that question without doing any injustice to anybody. I want to impress this upon the minds of Senators so they will understand it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ELKINS. Being my colleague on the committee and in charge of this bill, I do not want to make any distinction, and I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his courtesy. The question just broached by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is a very important one, probably as perplexing as any other with which we have to deal. With regard to rates between Cincinnati and Atlanta, for instance, or Chattanooga, they are, as I understand the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to say, the same as from New York, twice as far away.

Mr. FORAKER. I should say practically the same.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. I am speaking relatively. They are practically the same; but the Senator should consider in that case that the Atlantic Ocean runs from New York down as far as Savannah, giving water transportation, and that the railroad haul from Savannah to the interior there would give some little reason for an apparent discrimination against Cincinnati, where the road runs entirely overland, with no water transportation of any kind.

But let us consider that question as broached by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in his proposed amendment. He does not want the Interstate Commerce Commission to deal with the question of differentials or preferentials in regard to the ports of New England. I believe this question will never be settled justly and will never get to a place where it will satisfy the American people until we come to a flat mileage rate, where the people who live in any part of the United States will be compelled to take the disadvantages or the advantages of their location. Of course I can understand that New England, as of old, should be anxious to maintain any advantages which she possesses.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; but I do not know whether my other colleague on the committee [Mr. TILLMAN] has finished.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not through at all. I am just beginning to present the question.

Mr. ELKINS. I don't want so many speeches made in my speech. I will answer questions, and I want to oblige all Senators, but I can not yield to Senators to make speeches.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator was sitting down until I got up. Why does he not sit down again?

Mr. ELKINS. If I do, I am afraid the Senator will speak all day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. ELKINS. If Senators will allow me, I will answer questions, but I do not want to yield otherwise.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is not going to cut my argument off right behind the ears in that way, is he? [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator can make his argument, and I will answer him when discussing the amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator insists, I will have to give way; but as the subject was broached by other Senators and you allowed them to have their say, I was trying to give my views; I think it a little unkind, but, of course, I will have to submit.

Mr. ELKINS. You have talked as long as the other two.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suppose I have more to talk about than they have. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. But you will have to give me a chance.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will get out of the way. There is plenty of time, I imagine. Unless the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] will agree to an early vote, we will have ample opportunity to discuss all of these questions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not want the Senator to feel hurt.

Mr. TILLMAN. I must feel that you have not treated me with the same courtesy that you have treated others; but I will get even with you. The Senator had better take care; I will get even with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator always gets even, but I am ready to meet the Senator on getting even in this debate or any other debate. But I did try to be just as courteous to him as to others, and I sent a page to him to tell him to get in, because I saw he was getting very restless.

Mr. TILLMAN. And as soon as I get in you jerk me off my feet.

Mr. ELKINS. But the trouble with you is you want to make a speech every five minutes while I am speaking. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state his point of order.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from South Carolina are both out of order, and have been repeatedly so, in addressing each other as "you," which is against the rule of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The Senator from West Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I know this is one of the most important questions raised under this bill. I have shown, I think, conclusively that the power to fix rates between localities is given in the bill, and that it is a dangerous power, and I expressed the hope that a definite provision be incorporated in the bill against conferring this power on the Commission, and I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire does meet the case. Probably it might be changed somewhat.

THROUGH ROUTES AND THROUGH RATES.

Through routes and through rates are desirable and would furnish shippers and producers wider markets for their products, and I wish the bill provided, in a way free from objections, for establishing through routes and rates. Shippers often on one line of railroad can not reach points or markets on other lines because there are no through routes and rates established.

If a shipper on one line of railroad finds a market at some point on connecting lines and there is no through route established or rate made to that point, while the connecting line or lines could not refuse to haul his products, they could charge such a rate that would make it impossible to ship as against the shipper on another line who has a through rate to the same point, and therefore he would be excluded from the market.

If a shipper on the Baltimore and Ohio wants to reach a point on the Reading, Pennsylvania, New York Central, or Lehigh Valley, and there is no through route or rate, he is excluded from any point on those lines unless he pays local rates, which would be prohibitive. The bill attempts to afford a remedy by giving the Commission the power to establish through routes and rates, but is so drawn that I fear it defeats the purpose desired.

State laws authorize an intrastate road to make certain charges for transporting freight and passengers. Can this intrastate road, entirely under State jurisdiction, be made a part of a through route and be forced into an arrangement with three or four other roads, whereby it gives up the right to name its local rate, and haul through freight at a rate named by the Commission which it does not agree is profitable or remunerative?

Suppose the carriers refuse to establish a through route from New York to points in Arkansas, Texas, or California, and upon complaint the Commission establishes one and names the rate; and suppose when freight is offered to the Pennsylvania Railroad in New York, being the initial road in the through route named, it says that with the business it has in hand it can not undertake to transport this freight to points in Arkansas, Texas, or California, for the reason that the business demands upon the road in the States of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, where it was incorporated, and other States where its lines reach, are greater than it can do, and if its cars are sent to these distant points it will be compelled to refuse freight offered on its home lines and subject its charter to forfeiture by a proceeding on the part of the State. Then, again, some of the connecting lines, especially the intrastate lines, might not have the motive power to haul this traffic. Under these circumstances can Congress compel the initial line to furnish the cars and connecting lines the motive power on this through route?

It is difficult to see how one carrier can virtually be given the use of the road and equipment of another carrier without the consent of that carrier and without any judicial determination as to the just compensation to which that carrier is entitled. No tribunal but a court can decide what is just compensation. The terms and conditions under which through routes are operated are essentially matters of contract involving a great many different and difficult details, among them what schedules shall be maintained, what proportion of the equipment each company shall furnish.

SUSPENSION OF ORDER PENDING SUIT FROM A PRACTICAL STANDPOINT.

If the right to suspend the order of the Commission in the discretion of the court should be denied, this might work serious results from a practical standpoint. Should the Commission find the rate named by the carrier excessive and reduce it, and the reduced rate goes into effect at once and remains until the final hearing and determination of the action to set it aside in the circuit court, then this new rate, pending the litigation, would have to be published as all other rates, and if the rate reduced affects other rates—and it may affect hundreds of other rates—then all of these rates would have to be reduced, go into effect, and likewise be published.

If the court should hold that the carrier was right and the rate it made in the first instance was not excessive, then the reduced rate and all other rates changed would be restored.

The price of products would have to be advanced or reduced accordingly as the changes might take place in the rates. It takes time for merchants, shippers, and communities to accommodate their business to changed rates, because changes in rates bring about changes in prices. In any event, from a practical standpoint, there should be as few changes in rates as possible. But if the order made by the Commission naming a substitute rate should be suspended pending a suit, this should be done only upon the condition that a deposit in money is made in court by the carrier sufficient to pay back to the shipper the difference between the rate made by the carrier and the one made by the Commission and suspended by the court. In this way the shipper would be absolutely protected without being required to sue the carrier for the difference he may have paid. For my part I would prefer, if it could be done, that the substituted rate made by the Commission go into effect within a reasonable time and remain in force until the determination of any suit to set it aside; but able lawyers say that the courts have the right upon proper showing to grant interlocutory injunctions, and this right can not be taken from the courts.

DIVIDED RESPONSIBILITY.

If there should be no review by the courts of the orders of the Commission then the rates fixed by the Commission will be final unless its order violates some provision of the Constitution. This leads to a divided responsibility between the railroads and the Government in the management of the railroads. The Commission in effect acting for Congress would do the most important thing connected with the management of a railroad, to wit, fix the price of transportation, the only thing a railroad has to sell. Divided responsibility in business is most always attended with failure, and with the Government is almost sure to be, and this happening, the next move would be to try to secure government ownership of railroads. It may then come about, as it often does in the business, social, and political world, that extremes meet for a common purpose. Those favoring government ownership would join the owners of railroads in imploring Congress to take over the railroads, even at a fair price. Under certain conditions, government ownership of railroads would not be opposed by the owners of railroads as much as by a majority of the thoughtful people of the country.

There is a wide difference between government regulation to prevent excessive rates and correct abuses, and government management of railroads. The power is conferred on the Commission in section 15 of the bill to prescribe what "regulation or practice affecting rates" is just and reasonable, and to establish through routes and rates and prescribe the division of the same, and the "terms and conditions under which such through routes shall be operated." Just what the words "regulation or practice affecting rates and terms and conditions under which through routes shall be operated" mean no one knows, and will not until the courts consider them.

One thing is certain, they mean more than regulating commerce and fixing rates, and seem to go far in the direction of management by the Commission. Operating a route is not clear; operating a railroad is quite clear. The words must apply to railroads and mean the terms and conditions upon which railroads making up the through routes shall be operated. If so, this would be government management, in which the railroads would have little or no part.

The true limit of government regulation should be to secure by proper laws ample protection to the public interests—protection to the shippers and the people against excessive rates and all abuses, wrongs, injustices, and discriminations by railroads. The first and longest step toward government ownership would be government management of railroads. In trying to properly regulate rates we should be careful not to confer power on the Commission, even by implication, to manage railroads.

If we should find the Commission had power even to in part manage railroads, this would not last long. The railroads, in my judgment, would prefer government ownership.

I submit to the Senate that when you confer the power to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which routes shall be operated, you are going a long way. "Routes" means nothing if it don't mean railroads.

Mr. SPOONER. Would it not be subject to judicial review?

Mr. ELKINS. If the power is given to be exercised by the Commission, then the order would be subject to review, unless the orders of the Commission are made final. I do not see how it would be interpreted otherwise. I am strongly in favor of widening markets by allowing shippers to get to all markets alike, but I do not see how, under the language of this bill, this can be done.

Capital is always timid; if it is fettered or handicapped beyond the point that it deems fair treatment it will take wings and fly away. It will not long share a divided responsibility with the Government. It must be free to manage its investments as it sees fit inside the law. If the owners of railroads find they are denied the rights granted other litigants in the courts and can not have the protection of the courts in the management of their property, they may not only consent but seek government ownership, in order to invest their capital in some branch of business the Government does not undertake in part to control.

REDUCTION OF RATES.

In the United States we have the lowest rate, the highest wages, and the best railroad service in the world. During the last thirty years rates have been reduced from 2 cents per ton per mile to about seven and one-half mills per ton per mile. On some railroads last year the average rate per ton per mile was as low as 6 mills and a fraction per ton per mile. How much further this reduction in the aggregate can go is difficult to tell—possibly if the grades and curves are improved, better equipment and better motive power provided, the average rate might be reduced to half a cent per ton per mile and yet afford a fair return to the carrier, but surely the rate can not go much lower.

When the Windom Commission made its report—and that is within the memory of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] and many other Senators—the great question was whether the rate could ever get lower than a cent a ton a mile. Now we have about 6 mills a ton a mile on the average and lower still on some railroads. It has been pushed down to that point, but I do not know how much further it can go; I do not think beyond 5 mills per ton per mile. Already we are so near the dividing line that the reduction of a mill or two per ton per mile may mark the difference between profit or loss. It is remarkable what an enormous saving there has been to the people in thirty years in the voluntary reduction of rates by the railroads. Take, for instance, the case of the Great Northern Railroad. A statement prepared by Mr. James J. Hill, president of the road, shows that on this single road in thirty years the reduction has been over $679,000,000. What a saving to the people!

This reduction applies to all other roads in the country, and the aggregate of the saving to the people from the reduction in rates for the last thirty years reaches figures almost incomprehensible. This saving was not the result of Government regulation, but was due to the voluntary action of the railroads.

Because railroads have constantly reduced rates and developed the country and are the most important factor in our commercial and business expansion furnishes no reason why they should not be subject to proper regulation. With the great benefits and advantages railroads bring to the country there should not follow in their wake evils and abuses that oppress the people.

All property honestly acquired is sacred and entitled to protection under the law, and there ought to be no distinction under the law between different kinds of property, but no class of owners of property should be allowed to do anything against the public interest. The people's rights and the public interests are the first care of statesmen, and are higher and beyond any special interest or business or all combined. The public weal and public welfare should be the first considerations in all we may do here. There is general unrest among the people all over the world, and more generally than ever in our own country. Just what the outcome of this unrest may be no one can foresee. Many believe that individualism, with its vast benefits, and of late its vast evils to society, has about run its course, and in its stead during the 20th century will come about some form of collectivism which we do not yet understand.

MAKING RAILROAD RATES.

Making and adjusting railroad rates, even by the most experienced traffic managers, is most difficult. Presidents of railroads and boards of directors rarely have anything to say or do about making rates. This intricate and complicated duty is confided to the traffic managers and their subordinates. They must keep their fingers on the commercial and industrial pulse of the country every moment to know what to do in the matter of adjusting rates; they must confer daily with thousands of business men all over the country and be in touch with every movement of the markets. Generally market conditions and competitive industries determine rates and not traffic managers; they simply respond to these conditions. The Weather Bureau records the weather but does not make it.

Three hundred rate schedules are received daily by the Interstate Commerce Commission; the present annual average is 100,000 schedules. From 1887 to 1904 there were 2,358,960 rate schedules filed in the office of the Interstate Commerce Commission. A rate may be profitable to-day and not profitable to-morrow. Rates reasonable on one line may be unreasonable on another to the same or different points, though the distance be the same. If railroads can have loads both ways for a year or even a month they can make lower rates than if they have loads only one way.

These and many other factors that might be mentioned enter into the making of railroad rates, and make their adjustment complicated, intricate, and difficult. The regulation of rates and the prevention of all sorts of abuses, discriminations, and rebates should be left to the Government—the management of railroads to their owners.

The hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee show, and all agree, as a general rule the great majority of shippers are satisfied with the rates made by railroads; that rebates and discriminations are growing less, as the present laws are executed and they are being enforced vigorously; but this, as I have said before, is no reason why there should not be the strictest regulation against excessive rates and abuses of every kind, so as to protect the people and minimize evils and abuses. Because people are, as a rule, honest is no reason why there should not be laws against dishonesty, murder, burglary, larceny, embezzlement, etc.

The aim of wise statesmanship should be to so adjust matters by proper legislation that the shipper and producer can make a fair profit on their products, the railroad a fair return for the service rendered, and the consumer get what he buys at a fair price.

I considered some time whether to say "just compensation" or "fair return on capital" instead, as has been suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. But I used the term "fair return for the service rendered" as possibly the best words.

There should be no real antagonism between the shipper, the carrier, and the consumer; their interests should be mutual and not conflicting. Legislators should work to this end and try to promote and safeguard the public interest without feeling, without prejudice, without passion, and without pressure from popular clamor. This would reach the height of genuine statesmanship. For the last eight years I have been a member of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and have had ample opportunity of judging the work of the Commission, which at times has not been fully understood and appreciated. It is needless to say that the Commission is made up of men of fine ability and of the very highest character. They have from the beginning devoted themselves to the important and difficult work in hand with zeal and tireless industry. The Commission has been called upon to treat a most important and difficult subject under new legislation and interpret new laws which had not been passed upon by the courts; they had to trod paths unknown and untried, and the work has at all times been most serious and difficult. The public does not hear or know of the great work of the Commission, by far of the largest part of the work the Commission does. Since its organization it has settled amicably between railroads and shippers nearly three thousand cases without contest, trial, or proceedings in court. In this way a great deal of good has been done and a great many differences reconciled between shippers and railroads under new legislation difficult to interpret and understand. The Commission by law is intrusted with the most difficult and delicate subject in our economic development, and they have met the duties laid upon them with great ability, and an honesty and integrity that has never been assailed.

Mr. President, I now wish to consider some of the legal phases of the rate question.

Mr. FORAKER. If I do not interrupt the Senator, before he takes up this other subject I should like to ask him to tell us why he arrived finally at the conclusion that the proper expression to use in that connection is "a fair return for the service rendered."

Mr. ELKINS. I will say to the Senator, as I tried to explain, that I had some hesitancy about it. I had it "fair return on the capital" at first. Just what words to use gave me some trouble. I finally decided on those I have used, because on the whole I thought "a fair return for the service rendered" covered everything the carrier could justly ask and the words would be fair to the public.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ELKINS. For a question.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is for a question, but the Senator will kindly pardon a sentence or two in explanation of the question. I ask it for the purpose of securing information with respect to the views of the Senator on an important matter with which I am very much concerned—that is, the question which the Senator is discussing as to the rate to be charged by railroad companies.

Under the present law they may charge a just and reasonable rate. Under this bill, which came from the committee of which the Senator is a member, the rate to be fixed by the Commission is to be just and reasonable and fairly remunerative. If the Senator will pardon a further word, the Supreme Court has held that the words "just and reasonable" have relation both to the rights of the public and of the companies, and that the rate must be fixed with reference to the rights of each. Now the committee, or at least the bill—whoever may be responsible for it—adds the words "fairly remunerative," as the measure of the rate which is to be fixed for carrying freight and passengers. I call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the definition of "remunerative" in the Standard Dictionary: "Affording, or tending to afford, ample remuneration; giving good or sufficient return; paying; profitable."

Now, what I desire to ask the Senator is this: First, what is the purpose of using the additional words "fairly remunerative," and if, in his judgment, those words do not have the effect of liberalizing the rule rather than of narrowing it or keeping it where it is under the common law and under the decisions of the Supreme Court, and if the words "fairly remunerative" do not have exclusive reference to the interests of the companies? And, lastly, I will ask the Senator if he will join with some of us in striking the words "fairly remunerative" from the bill?

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator will do me the honor to listen to what I have to say further on, I will try to answer his questions more at length. It is difficult to say what the words "fairly remunerative" mean; whether they lay down a standard by which the courts can determine anything. I fear in the use of these words we get into a wide and unknown sea. I think the words "fairly remunerative" add to the difficulties of the question, as I shall try to show. The words "just and reasonable" furnish a standard by which the Commission is to be guided or to which it must adhere. I will shortly come to the point the Senator from Texas has raised.

Mr. CULBERSON. Would the Senator, in that connection, pardon another inquiry directed to the Senator from Iowa? And I make the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa for obvious reasons which have been developed in the last few days.

I will ask the Senator from Iowa if he believes the words "fairly remunerative" liberalize the rule by which the rate is to be measured, and if he would join with some of us in striking those words from the bill?

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator from Texas had better ask the Senator from Iowa at another time. For my part, I am willing to strike out those words.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am sure the Senator from Iowa would be glad to answer now if the Senator from West Virginia would yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield for that purpose?

Mr. ELKINS. I have to do the most painful act of my life—refuse the Senator his request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. Of course I do not understand what the Senator from Iowa said to the Senator from West Virginia, in an undertone, but I appreciate all the same the reasons why the Senator from West Virginia does not yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I will discuss the point when I get to it later on.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. ELKINS. With a great deal of hesitancy.

Mr. SPOONER resumed his seat.

Mr. ELKINS. Proceed.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question.

Mr. ELKINS. I could not yield to the Senator from Wisconsin and can not to the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I will now consider some of the legal aspects of the rate-making question.

LEGAL PRINCIPLES INVOLVED.

The general principles underlying and applicable to the power of Congress over the subject of rates by interstate carriers may be stated as follows:

1. At common law a common carrier is prohibited from making any unreasonably high charge for its services, and this prohibition has been incorporated in section 1 of the act to regulate commerce. (Int. Com. Com. v. Railway Co., 167 U. S., 479, 505.) Thus the shipper has a common-law and statutory right of protection against unjustly and unreasonably high rates.

2. To decide, upon the evidence, in a case properly before the court, whether any rate charged by a common carrier is unreasonably high, or, in other words, in excess of the maximum rate which would be reasonable, has always been regarded as a judicial function. (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S., 155, 161; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S., 413, 458; Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 154 U. S., 362, 397.)

3. Any governmental regulation establishing rates for the transportation of persons or property which will not admit of the carrier's earning such compensation as under all the circumstances is just to it and to the public would deprive such carrier of its property without due process of law. Such regulation, if by State authority, would violate the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States (Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S., 466, 526); and, if by Federal authority, would obviously violate in the same way the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Thus the carrier has a constitutional right of protection against unjustly and unreasonably low rates.

4. The determination of the question whether a governmental regulation establishes rates for the transportation of persons and property so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without such compensation as the Constitution secures is a subject of judicial inquiry. "The duty rests upon all courts, Federal and State, when their jurisdiction is properly invoked, to see to it that no right secured by the supreme law of the land is impaired or destroyed by legislation." (Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S., 466, 526, 527.)

5. There may be, and generally would be, a wide range between, on the one hand, the highest rate which a common carrier could impose on the shipper without violating the shipper's common-law and statutory right to be protected against an unjustly and unreasonably high rate, and, on the other hand, the lowest rate which governmental authority could impose on the carrier without violating the carrier's constitutional right to be protected against an unjustly and unreasonably low rate. Between these two extremes there may be many different rates, each of which would necessarily be just and reasonable, because not transgressing either one of the two limits of justice and reasonableness.

6. The governmental power to prescribe rates for carriage by a common carrier is a legislative and not an administrative or judicial function. (Int. Com. Com. v. Railway Co., 167 U. S., 479, 505.)

7. Congress having the power to establish the interstate rates of common carriers, it would follow that Congress would have an unlimited discretion to fix any such rate at any point between the maximum rate which the carrier could lawfully charge the shipper and the minimum rate which Congress could constitutionally impose upon the carrier. This would be a wide range of discretion, and would be a purely legislative discretion.

8. That legislative power can not be delegated to any other officer or tribunal is well established and is fully recognized in the case of Clark v. Field (143 U. S., 649). Hence it follows that Congress can not delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the discretionary legislative power which Congress has under the commerce clause, whereby Congress may fix any interstate rate of a common carrier at any point between the maximum reasonable rate which the carrier could lawfully charge the shipper and the minimum rate which Congress could constitutionally impose upon the carrier.

9. The Attorney-General, in his letter of May 5, 1905, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, holds that the only way in which a rate-fixing power can be conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission is for Congress to enact into law some standard of charges which shall control, and then to entrust to the Commission the duty to fix rates in conformity with that standard. In this I fully agree.

10. It would seem to follow from these premises—

First. That any legislation attempting to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix rates will be unconstitutional unless it prescribes "the standard of charges which shall control," and requires the Commission to conform thereto in fixing rates.

Mr. KEAN. When the Senator concludes, I will submit a few remarks on that subject.

Mr. ELKINS. Second. That any legislation attempting to fix rates would be unconstitutional whose practical effect is to deny to common carriers the right to invoke and obtain, in due time, the protection of the courts from being compelled to transport persons or property at rates which violate the carrier's constitutional rights.

In the light of the principles just stated an examination of the bill under consideration may be instructive.

DELEGATION OF POWER IN HEPBURN BILL.

The only standard of charges prescribed by the act to regulate commerce is the common-law standard that rates shall not be unreasonably and unjustly high. This standard is vague, but still it is a standard because it is a thing judicially ascertainable which the courts have always recognized it was their right and duty to ascertain in proper cases. For Congress to enact merely this standard and then confer upon an administrative tribunal the authority to make such changes in rates as are necessary to prevent those rates from being unreasonably high, would delegate a wide discretion and a tremendous power to such a tribunal. The power so delegated to the administrative tribunal would be the greatest power exercised by any administrative tribunal in the world.

Notwithstanding these considerations, it is probable that the courts would hold constitutional an act delegating to an administrative tribunal the power to change rates of interstate common carriers so far as might be necessary to prevent their being unreasonably high in violation of the common-law and statutory prohibition, because such act would furnish a judicially ascertainable standard of charges to control, and would require the administrative tribunal to conform to that standard. It is believed, however, that this is the furthest extent to which the courts would go in sanctioning a delegation of the rate-fixing power to an administrative tribunal. The Hepburn bill seems to go far beyond this point.

The bill does not require the Commission to conform to the statutory and judicially ascertainable standard; it does not provide that the Commission shall change rates only so far as to prevent their being unreasonably high. Such a limitation on the power of the Commission seems to be the thing sought to be avoided by the framers of the bill in its present shape, and its language shows an intention to confer power upon the Commission free from any such limitation.

The language of the bill seems designed to turn the entire subject of regulation, which is within the power of Congress, over to the discretion of the Commission. The Commission is given full authority to act not merely when rates in fact violate the law but whenever the Commission "shall be of opinion" that the rates are unjust or unreasonable.

They determine their own jurisdiction by their own opinion. Thus the Commission's opinion is sought to be made the sole basis of its jurisdiction. When the Commission thus chooses to act, it is authorized not merely to change rates so far as may be necessary to prevent their being unreasonably high, or, in other words, to make them conform to the statutory standard of lawfulness, but the Commission is given full authority to prescribe "what will, in its judgment, be the just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate," that is final and not subject to review by the courts, without the order of the Commission violates some constitutional provision. Thus it is sought to make the Commission's "judgment" the sole limitation upon the Commission's authority, subject, of course, to the limitation of the carrier's constitutional rights; in other words, the Commission is authorized to change the rate just as far as Congress itself could change the rate. This turns over to the Commission all the discretionary power that Congress itself could exercise.

The introduction of the words "fairly remunerative" does not furnish a statutory standard of charges which is to control. And here I invite the attention of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to what I am about to say touching the words "fairly remunerative." Nobody knows what the term really means, and it has never been regarded as a judicially ascertainable standard. As already pointed out, any rate between the maximum lawful rate as against the shipper and the minimum lawful rate as against the carrier may be regarded as fairly remunerative, for, if not fairly remunerative under all the circumstances, it would not seem to be the just compensation to which the carrier is entitled under the Constitution.

Moreover, the fact that one rate is fairly remunerative is perfectly consistent with the fact that five or six other rates for the same service may be also fairly remunerative. The Commission may be of opinion that each of five or six different rates would be "fairly remunerative;" consequently its choice between these rates would be a matter of arbitrary discretion.

Certainly the bill does not prescribe any "standard of charges which is to control" by introducing the words "fairly remunerative." These words do not and can not establish a legal standard for any purpose.

Under the act to regulate commerce a carrier has the right to charge the highest rate which is not unlawful, or, in other words, the maximum reasonable rate. This bill, however, carefully refrains from limiting the authority of the Commission to determining "the maximum just and reasonable rate," which is the only standard the act to regulate commerce prescribes, but, on the contrary, gives the Commission the right to fix any rate which in its judgment is a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate, and prescribes that that rate shall be the maximum.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the Senator from West Virginia is in error in stating that the present law authorizes the carriers to fix the maximum.

Mr. ELKINS. I did not say that.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. ELKINS. The bill, I say, does.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think the bill does not do that.

Mr. ELKINS. I think it does.

Mr. CULBERSON. The bill, as I understand it—and it is a matter to which I would be glad to have the Senator direct his attention—provides that the carriers shall fix just and reasonable rates. That ordinarily would be absolute rates. But the Commission is authorized to fix only just and reasonable maximum rates.

Mr. ELKINS. And fairly remunerative.

Mr. CULBERSON. And fairly remunerative.

Mr. ELKINS. In the bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. In the bill. I invite the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to this distinction between the character of rates fixed by the railroad companies and the character of rates which the Commission is authorized to fix in lieu of those fixed by the carriers; and I ask him if it does not at least create confusion?

Mr. ELKINS. I think, as I said before, the insertion of the words "fairly remunerative" in this bill in addition to the old law does produce confusion.

Mr. CULBERSON. But the Senator apparently does not catch the point. The point is this: The railroad companies are authorized to fix absolute rates, which must be just and reasonable. The Interstate Commerce Commission is only authorized to fix just and reasonable and fairly remunerative maximum rates.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not think this changes it materially, although one rule is laid down for the carriers and a different one as the standard for the Commission. My idea is that the Commission ought to have the power only to modify a rate made by the carriers to the extent of relieving it of unreasonableness, unlawfulness, and injustice. This is the power which I think the Commission should exercise and go no further, and it ought to be in this bill. Is not that satisfactory to the Senator from Texas? I listened to his speech with great interest.

Mr. CULBERSON. The rate provided by the bill is not at all satisfactory to me, and my constant reiteration of this question to Senators who have spoken is in that way to give notice to those in charge of the bill that in my judgment it must be amended in that particular.

Mr. ELKINS. I agree with the Senator that these words confuse the bill.

But to resume my argument: Thus a rate higher than the rate prescribed by the Commission might be reasonable and just and therefore entirely lawful under the act which Congress has passed; but Congress gives the power to the Commission to repeal this law pro tanto by fixing another just and reasonable rate lower than the maximum which is lawful, and making this lower rate thereafter the maximum.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas if it is his opinion that we should confine ourselves to the words "just and reasonable rates?"

Mr. CULBERSON. I think that we should, because the meaning of that term is thoroughly understood, at least by the courts and by the profession and by that portion of the public which is specially interested in this question.

Mr. FORAKER. I only wanted to know whether the Senator had suggested any amendment to take the place of the words "fairly remunerative?"

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to strike out the words "fairly remunerative" and insert "just and reasonable."

Mr. ELKINS. I agree to that, but I am not in charge of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will agree to it.

Mr. ELKINS. Then we are agreed.

Mr. TILLMAN. On one thing.

Mr. ELKINS. Now, the Senator thought I said that disgrace attached to this bill. I do not think this bill is bad; it is a good bill in many respects and will do great good. That was a mere pleasantry. I said what I did because the Senator disclaims any paternity for his child. I withdraw the words. I think the framers of the bill have done a great deal of conscientious work on it, and I think the Senator from South Carolina himself is trying to make it a good bill. I only said that in jest, and I hope the Senator will take it that way.

Mr. TILLMAN. I accept the Senator's apology.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like the attention of the Senator from Texas.

The bill prescribes no standard of lawful charges which imposes that duty upon the carriers, yet it is proposed to give to the Commission the authority in its unguided discretion to reduce rates to that point if it chooses to do so. I think this answers the questions of the Senator from Texas. A clearer delegation of legislative power, uncontrolled by any standard established by the legislature itself, could not be imagined.

It may be contended that the courts will limit the authority of the Commission to changing rates so far only as may be necessary in order to prevent them from being unreasonably high, and in that way the courts will, by construction, confine the Commission to the only legal standard which the act to regulate commerce prescribes. It would seem clear, however, that the courts would not in this way revise the language used by Congress. In the Trade-mark cases (100 U. S., 82, 98) the Supreme Court said:

> While it may be true that when one part of a statute is valid and constitutional and another part is unconstitutional and void, the court may enforce the valid part, where they are distinctly separable, so that each can stand alone, it is not within the judicial province to give to the words used by Congress a narrower meaning than they are manifestly intended to bear, in order that crimes may be punished which are not described in language that brings them within the constitutional power of that body.

The question of such a delegation of power under the Federal Constitution is an entirely new question, upon which there is no controlling authority.

It is true the Supreme Court has held that the delegation of rate-making power to State commissions did not take the property of railroad companies without due process of law, contrary to the fourteenth amendment. In those cases, however, the Supreme Court did not undertake to decide whether the State statutes delegated a power to administrative tribunals, which under the State constitutions could only be exercised by the legislatures themselves. The question as to whether the Hepburn bill delegates to the Interstate Commerce Commission a legislative discretion will arise not under the fifth amendment, which prohibits the taking of property without due process of law, but out of the underlying principle of the whole Constitution that legislative power must be exercised by the legislative department of the Government. The question has never been passed upon or considered.

It should further be borne in mind that most, if not all, of the decisions relating to State constitutions will not even be persuasive authority with the Supreme Court of the United States to support the delegation of power attempted by this bill, because in many of the cases the State constitutions expressly contemplate the delegation of such a power, and in most, if not all, of the cases the delegation of power is made with limitations, more or less clearly expressed, which are entirely absent from the bill under consideration.

I wanted to introduce here some extracts from the Michigan tax case just decided, but I have been unable to get a copy of the decision, and I will not refer to it further because I have only seen the quotation in the papers. But it seems that it has a direct bearing upon conferring this power, which might be useful and instructive. I am indebted to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] for an extract from Judge Brewer's decision.

Mr. SPOONER. As published in the papers.

Mr. ELKINS. As published in the papers.

> In the nation no one of the three great departments can assume or be given the functions of another, for the Constitution distinctly grants to the President, Congress, and the judiciary separately, the executive, legislative, and judicial powers of the nation. It may, therefore, be conceded that an attempted delegation by Congress to the President or any ministerial officer or board of power to fix a rate of taxation or exercise other legislative functions would be adjudged unconstitutional.

I am much obliged to the Senator. I tried to get the decision, as I desired to put it in my remarks. I will let this go into my remarks. I could not get the decision in time.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will make his extract from the decision itself. I understand that there is some little discrepancy between the newspaper report and the decision.

Mr. ELKINS. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. I was afraid to take what I saw in the newspaper. I do not want to becloud the situation by a newspaper report.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his judgment, in view of the extract which has been published in the papers purporting to declare it to be the opinion of the court that the three great departments of the Government must be kept separate, and that no one department shall exercise the functions of the other, the Constitution having explicitly placed in Congress the power to regulate commerce, would it not be a surrender of our functions or a usurpation by the judiciary of legislative functions if we can not fix rates, if we can not regulate commerce? In other words, the Senator from Wisconsin and others declare that it would be unconstitutional if we undertook to declare that a rate can be suspended, and therefore the judges are to come in and determine for themselves whether or not Congress has exceeded its authority, etc. Is it not an infringement of legislative power, a surrender of it, on our part if we do not do it, and a usurpation on the part of the judiciary if it assumes to do it?

Mr. ELKINS. I am coming to the question of the right of suspension, and I will discuss it. It is difficult, but I have a definite opinion on the subject.

With a few exceptions, all are agreed that some provision——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ELKINS. I will. The Senator is a member of the committee.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Before the Senator goes to this new point, I should like to ask him a question regarding the subject which he has been discussing as to the delegation of power to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Assuming that the words "fairly remunerative" were stricken out and the power was given to this Commission to fix just and reasonable rates, does he regard that as fixing the standard which is to control the action of the Commission, or does he regard that expression as a complete delegation to the Commission of all the power that Congress has regarding the fixing of rates?

Mr. ELKINS. I answered that a while ago when the Senator was not in the Chamber. If Congress fixes a standard by which the Commission is to be governed, and then it is provided that the Commission shall go no further in changing a rate made by the carrier than modifying it to the extent of relieving it of its unreasonableness or injustice or unlawfulness, then that becomes a judicial question, which can be inquired into; but if Congress confers the power upon the Commission to fix what it considers a fair, just, and reasonable rate, in its judgment, that is final and conclusive, as much so as if Congress had said you shall fix a rate of 50 cents a ton.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator regard that as a transfer from the legislative department to this administrative board of all the legislative power that Congress has on that subject?

Mr. ELKINS. No; I do not. If Congress should empower the Commission to say what in its judgment would be a fair and reasonable rate, then Congress delegates its legislative discretion, but if Congress confers power on the Commission to modify a rate made by the Commission only to the extent and so far as to relieve it of its unlawfulness, unreasonableness, or injustice, then this is not final, and Congress does not delegate all of its legislative power, and what the Commission may do can be reviewed by the courts.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator a moment ago read from a newspaper clipping a part of what Mr. Justice Brewer said. In the decision to which he referred he omitted to read a part that I want to call attention to in this connection. I do not know that it will appear in the opinion as it is to be published by the court, but it was published in the newspapers for some reason as a part of that opinion, and it is certainly good law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator understand that the Supreme Court ever gives out an opinion that is different from the opinion it afterwards publishes?

Mr. FORAKER. I have no special understanding on the subject. I understand that the opinions of the court are prepared by some justice to whom that duty is assigned, and that after it has been prepared and printed it is submitted to his colleagues by the justice who prepared it before it is announced from the bench; and that they are in the habit when they consider it of revising it, if they think it should be revised. I understand that the opinion Mr. Justice Brewer delivered will be printed precisely as it was delivered from the bench, but——

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly, but I was just trying——

Mr. FORAKER. I have also learned in a roundabout way, simply from common talk—I do not know where it originated—that somehow or other the opinion as it was originally prepared by Mr. Justice Brewer before he submitted it to his colleagues was published in the newspapers. In some way it was given out not as it was delivered from the bench, but as he originally prepared it, and that, I believe, is all that anybody yet has.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was trying to find out whether is was the habit of the Supreme Court to ever give out an opinion in that way as a kind of press agency affair.

Mr. FORAKER. No, Mr. President, I understand it is not the habit of the court at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought it was just the reverse; that nothing ever came from that court that was not authoritative and a finality.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want the Senator to think that I would suggest for one moment that the court puts out anything except only that which the court does. We have some very enterprising newspaper men; men who sometimes get hold of things and publish them in their zeal, in the best of good faith, of course. In this case, if there was such a publication prematurely, I am quite sure it was not the intention of anybody that there should be——

Mr. TILLMAN. Is the Senator aware of this fact?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know. I say——

Mr. HOPKINS. I desired to ask the Senator from Ohio a question, if he was about to read what purports to be the opinion of the court, as to whether it would be entirely fair to the court, inasmuch as there is a question as to what the court has actually said on that subject, to put in the RECORD what the newspaper says the court said?

Mr. FORAKER. I will say, in answer to the Senator from Illinois, that the Senator from West Virginia a few moments ago read a part of it. I thought if any of it was read it might as well all go in.

Mr. ELKINS. I withdrew it.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator has withdrawn it, I do not care about it.

Mr. ELKINS. I withdrew it because I want to get the correct opinion from the clerk of the court.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will put in his speech the correct opinion?

Mr. ELKINS. I will put in the correct opinion of the court in my remarks if I get a copy in time.

JUDICIAL REVIEW UNDER HEPBURN BILL.

With few exceptions all are agreed there should be some provision in the Hepburn bill definitely providing for a review by the courts of the orders of the Commission. The denial of a review by the courts of the orders of the Commission is new and has come about only during this last session of Congress.

In his last two messages the President favored a review of the orders of the Commission by the courts. There have been introduced in the House and Senate during and since 1905 twenty bills on the subject of rate legislation, and all save one provide in some manner or other for review of the orders of the Commission by the courts. Sixteen States legislating on the subject have also provided for court review. The difficulty is just what is the best way to prescribe the terms of this review by the courts. For my part I think a review by the court of the orders of the Commission necessary to make the bill constitutional; beyond this I am not wedded to any particular form or wording of the same. It is contended by some of the advocates of the bill and denied by others that the carrier will have thereunder ample opportunity to prevent the invasion of his constitutional rights; that it is unnecessary to make any express provision for judicial review, and that the right to such review is clearly recognized by the language of the bill.

The only expressions in the bill which can be construed as a recognition of the right in the carrier to obtain a judicial review of an order of the Commission fixing a rate are the following:

> Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier, and shall remain in force and be observed by the carrier unless the same shall be suspended or modified or set aside by the Commission or be suspended or set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.
> * * * The orders of the Commission shall take effect at the end of thirty days after notice thereof to the carriers directed to obey the same unless such orders shall have been suspended or modified by the Commission or suspended or set aside by the order or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction. * * *
> The venue of suits brought in any of the circuit courts of the United States to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend any order or requirement of the Commission shall be in the district where the carrier against whom such order or requirement may have been made has its principal operating office.

The expressions quoted do not confer any jurisdiction upon any courts to entertain proceedings by the carrier to set aside the orders of the Commission, but simply refer to such jurisdiction, if any, as may already exist in the courts. It is so well settled as to need no citation of authorities that the circuit courts of the United States can exercise only such jurisdiction as is conferred upon them by Congress. The only grant of jurisdiction to the circuit courts of the United States which could possibly cover a suit to set aside an order of the Commission is section 1 of the act of March 3, 1875, the material part of which reads as follows:

> That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original jurisdiction, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000, and arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Thus a circuit court of the United States can not by any possibility have jurisdiction of any proceeding to set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission where the matter in dispute does not exceed, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000. Under the bill the orders of the Commission are to remain in force only three years. It is entirely possible that an order of the Commission may be a palpable violation of the constitutional rights of the carrier, and yet the loss thus wrongfully inflicted will not equal in three years the sum or value of $2,000. As to every such case it is plain that there is no jurisdiction whatever in the circuit court of the United States to grant relief to the carrier. Of course, a carrier wrongfully threatened with a loss of $1,000 is as much entitled to relief as one wrongfully threatened with a loss of $100,000.

It will be observed, moreover, that if the circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of proceedings to set aside orders of the Commission the courts of the several States have exactly the same jurisdiction. This is expressly recognized by the language of the statute which is quoted. That this is true is made plain by the reasoning of the court in Plaquemines Freight Company v. Henderson (170 U. S., 511) and cases there cited.

If, therefore, the jurisdiction exists in the Federal courts to entertain proceedings to set aside orders of the Commission, such jurisdiction equally resides in the State courts and is exclusive in the State courts where the matter in dispute does not exceed, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $2,000. Of course such a proceeding in the State courts may be removed by the defendants to the circuit court of the United States in any case where the amount involved is sufficient to give the latter court jurisdiction.

This is an anomalous situation as to jurisdiction to set aside orders of the Commission which ought not to exist. If Congress intends the carrier to have any judicial protection an explicit grant of jurisdiction in the Federal courts should be provided, and for convenience should be confined to the Federal courts.

But even if a jurisdiction does reside in the State and Federal courts, as just pointed out, to entertain proceedings to set aside orders of the Commission, the further question remains, Against whom can such proceedings be instituted? Where is the defendant who can be made to respond and required to afford the relief to which the court may determine the carrier is entitled? The bill does not authorize the Commission to be made a defendant in such a suit. A suit against the Commission would be open to the objection that the suit was in effect against the Government of the United States. In Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., 466–518), it was said:

> It is the settled doctrine of this court that a suit against individuals for the purpose of preventing them, as officers of a State, from enforcing an unconstitutional enactment to the injury of the rights of the plaintiff is not a suit against the State within the meaning of that amendment (that is, the eleventh amendment).

It may be assumed that the same rule would apply to a suit against officers of the United States as is thus applied to suits against officers of a State. Therefore, in order to justify a suit against the Interstate Commerce Commission, it would be necessary to show that the Commission was upon the point of enforcing an unconstitutional enactment to the injury of the rights of the plaintiff. Under this bill, however, the primary method of enforcing the orders of the Commission is by heavy forfeitures, which are recoverable by civil suits in the name of the United States, and it is made the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to prosecute for the recovery of such forfeitures. To a suit against the Commission it might therefore very well respond that it had no intention of enforcing the order in question, and that the only purpose of the suit was to have an adjudication upon the constitutionality of an order having the effect of law, and that so far as the defendant was concerned this was a mere abstract question. As it is implied in the language of Smyth v. Ames, above quoted, that the only jurisdiction is for the purpose of preventing enforcement of the order by the defendants, it is not improbable that such a response would defeat the jurisdiction entirely. It is therefore a question of grave doubt as to whether the courts could entertain a proceeding against the Commission to set aside one of its orders.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ELKINS. I wish the Senator would excuse me.

Mr. PATTERSON. I know you are tired.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Senator is discussing a part of a controversy that is really the only controversy that seems to be occupying the attention of the Senate at this time, and that is the language that will be used in providing for the right of review. There seems to be no longer any controversy on the part of Senators as to the necessity for such a measure or as to the power of Congress to delegate within certain limits the power of rate making to a Commission, and the necessity for doing so. There seems to be a consensus of opinion that there is a right, to a limited extent at least, in the Supreme Court or in other courts to review the action of the Commission. The only controversy now seems to be over the language that will be used in providing for court review. Has the Senator from West Virginia concluded in his own mind what the wording should be or within what limitation the right of review should be kept?

Mr. ELKINS. I have reached a conclusion, but I can not get it put in the bill. I think it can be done by Congress prescribing a standard that the rate should be just and reasonable, and authorizing the Commission, if it should find that the rate made by the carrier is not just and reasonable, then it shall have power to modify the rate to the extent of relieving the rate of its injustice, unreasonableness, or unlawfulness.

Mr. PATTERSON. No; but then——

Mr. ELKINS. I have concluded—I think it can be done by Congress prescribing a standard that the rate should be just and reasonable, and authorizing the Commission, if it should find that the rate made by the carrier is not just and reasonable, then it shall have power to modify the rate to the extent of relieving the rate of its injustice, unreasonableness, or unlawfulness.

But able lawyers say that if the words "laws of the United States" are added to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] that would be all that is necessary to authorize a broad review of the orders of the Commission.

Mr. PATTERSON. I suppose the Senator has recognized that there are two schools in this body, if I may use this term, upon the question of the power to be conferred upon the court—one the conferring of broad, unlimited power, the other confining the decision and the operations of the court within a very narrow scope. Does the Senator belong to the broad gauge or the narrow gauge on that question?

Mr. ELKINS. I wish simply to say that, in my opinion, every material right or interest of a carrier, shipper, or locality affected by an order of the Commission should be entitled to a review by the courts.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the Senator take into consideration the fact that these rates are to be made or changed by a commission of experts, selected by the President, ratified by the Senate, receiving high salaries, men who, in all human probability, therefore, ought to be presumed to be honest, able, and skilled in the work they are to do, or does he place the work of such a commission upon the plane of the acts or doings of private individuals without law or other obligation beyond that which surrounds every citizen in the acts that are done?

Mr. ELKINS. I think I have answered that fully.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from West Virginia let me ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think it competent for Congress to make the finding of the Commission as to a rate conclusive because it is a high-salaried body, or for any other reason?

Mr. ALDRICH. And appointed by the President.

Mr. PATTERSON. No; I suppose not. I suppose the court——

Mr. ELKINS. If the Senator from Colorado will excuse me I will go on.

It may be remarked in passing that if the circuit court of the United States can entertain such proceeding against the Commission then the State courts can equally entertain such proceeding whenever the Commissioners are within the territorial jurisdiction of the State courts. As the Commission travels from place to place and all its members are frequently at points in the various States it is entirely possible that suits could thus be instituted in a State court and jurisdiction of the Commission obtained by actual service of process on all its members within the limits of the State. This is an anomalous condition which Congress should certainly avoid.

Even if the courts, State or Federal, should entertain jurisdiction of a suit against the Commission to set aside an order of the Commission, it is clear that the only relief which could be asked would be against the Commission, for in such a suit only the Commission could be enjoined from enforcing the order. A decree in such a suit would not be binding upon the Attorney-General or the district attorneys, who would not be and who could not be made parties to such a suit; nor would such a decree be binding upon any courts of law in which the district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney-General, might see fit to prosecute for the recovery of the forfeitures denounced by the act against the carrier which fails to obey the order of the Commission. It would seem clear, therefore, that the relief which could be obtained in a suit against the Commission, even if such suit could be maintained, would be utterly inadequate. It could not constitute a legal protection to the carrier.

No suit could be brought by the carrier to restrain the Attorney-General and all the district attorneys from prosecuting to recover the forfeitures for the carrier's failure to observe the order. Such a suit would be a suit against the United States. This proposition is clearly illustrated by the case of Fitts v. McGhee (172 U. S., 516), where the court held that a suit against the prosecuting officers of the State of Alabama, to enjoin their proceeding to recover penalties denounced for failing to observe the tolls established by the legislature for the use of a bridge, was a suit against the State, of which the court had no jurisdiction. The court therefore declined to pass upon the validity of the act or to entertain the suit for any purpose whatever.

The result is that no procedure is possible under the bill whereby the carrier may initiate any proceeding in which it can obtain adequate relief against an order of the Commission. Of course the carrier can not be compelled to observe a rate which violates the carrier's constitutional rights, but apparently the only way in which the carrier can avail itself of the constitutional protection is simply to refrain from charging a rate which the Commission orders it to charge, and when proceedings are instituted against the carrier to recover the forfeitures denounced by the act for its disobedience of the order to defend these proceedings by showing that the order is unconstitutional. As these penalties are $5,000 for each offense, and as each shipment will constitute a separate offense, the carrier, by adopting this course, would incur in the course of two or three weeks the risk of penalties far greater than the total loss it would sustain if it complied with the Commission's unlawful order. This, of course, amounts to an effort to intimidate the carrier, and these penalties, if constitutional, will have the effect of coercing the carrier into charging a rate fixed by the Commission rather than incur the risk of the enormous loss which would result from refraining from charging the rate for the purpose of inviting a proceeding in which it could contest the constitutionality of the order.

Even if the carrier could avoid the risk of cumulative penalties by refraining from charging the rate fixed by the Commission, and would incur the risk of only one penalty, yet it is clear that a civil suit to recover this penalty would be an inadequate method of determining the constitutionality of the right. Such an action would be triable at law and by a jury. The questions involved are so complicated as to make it utterly impracticable for a jury to pass intelligently upon them. Probably no two juries would entirely agree as to the effect of the proof introduced as to the illegality of a given rate. As was said in Smyth v. Ames (169 U. S., pp. 466-518):

> Only a court of equity is competent to meet such an emergency and determine once for all and without a multiplicity of suits matters that affect not simply individuals, but the interests of the entire community, as involved in the establishment of a public highway and in the administration of the affairs of the quasi-public corporation by which such highway is maintained.

If it be contended that on account of all these difficulties which lead to the conclusion that no adequate judicial review exists, the court will therefore construe the expressions of the bill above quoted, which refer to a court setting aside the order of the Commission, as impliedly granting a jurisdiction to the circuit courts to entertain proceedings in equity against the Commission and to give in such proceedings adequate relief and suspend or set aside the order of the Commission so as to prevent action thereon, not merely by the Commission but by the attorneys of the United States as well, the answer, in the first place, is that any such construction would be a case of judicial legislation; and in the second place, that if it is the intention of Congress to provide an adequate remedy in equity to deal with this situation there is not the remotest excuse for refusing to say so and for trusting that the courts will transcend their proper authority by saying Congress meant what it studiously refrained from declaring.

The bill seems to indicate clearly the intention of Congress that the courts shall not even pass upon the constitutionality of the order of the Commission. The only judicial proceeding expressly authorized to which the Commission is to be a party is a suit by the Commission to compel the enforcement of its order. This is an additional remedy to the civil suits by the district attorneys to recover the forfeitures. This proceeding is obviously an equitable proceeding, because the court is authorized therein to issue writs of injunction to compel the carrier to obey the Commission's order. A court in construing the bill would certainly be impressed with the fact that in this, the only instance where Congress undertook to confer a jurisdiction upon the United States circuit court sitting in equity to deal with an order of the Commission, the only two points which Congress authorizes the court to consider are, first, Was the order regularly made and duly served? and, second, Is the carrier in disobedience of the order? The court is not authorized by the jurisdiction granted to pass upon the further question whether the Commission's order violates the constitutional rights of the carrier.

If, therefore, the expressions quoted above wherein the act refers to suspending or setting aside an order of the Commission imply the creation of any jurisdiction, will not the courts construe the act as a whole and reach the conclusion that Congress merely intended that the orders of the Commission might be set aside, enjoined, or suspended only on the grounds which would justify the court in refusing to enforce the order at the instance of the Commission, to wit, that the order was not regularly made or duly served?

The conclusion to be drawn from these considerations is that no judicial review is provided for by the bill and it therefore evinces a purpose to prevent the carrier from obtaining such a review and to intimidate the carrier by the imposition of enormous and overwhelming penalties into observing the Commission's order, whether right or wrong. If this conclusion is justified, then it must follow either that the scheme of rate fixing provided for by the bill must fail, or at least the whole scheme of penalties must fail, leaving the orders of the Commission to be enforced only by suits in equity brought by the Commission, in which suits the courts will have to pass upon the lawfulness of the orders before they can take effect at all. The situation certainly calls for an amendment clearly giving an adequate judicial review.

I will conclude in a few minutes on the character and extent of this review. I have been asked by the Senator from Colorado on that particular point, and I tried to answer as briefly as I could.

CHARACTER AND EXTENT OF REVIEW.

Assuming that an express provision for judicial review is to be made, the important question remains, What shall be the character and extent of that judicial review?

It would seem clear, under the bill grant of power to the Commission, that the intervention by the Commission is absolutely dependent upon the will and discretion of the Commission down to the point where the carrier's constitutional rights are invaded. This, as already pointed out, delegates to the Commission, without any legal standard to control it, the full discretionary power which could be exercised by Congress itself. If such grant of power is not unconstitutional, it results that practically arbitrary power is given to the Commission over the property rights of the owners of the railroads and over the interests of all the people dependent upon the railroads, and, to a large extent, over the interests of shippers and localities, which will be vitally affected by the changes which the Commission can and will make in the relative advantages of competing localities. This would give the Commission a power as arbitrary as any Congress could exercise, and it would be wholly free from the constitutional checks which are designed to prevent arbitrary action by Congress.

The action of Congress is subject to veto by the President, but there is no veto power upon the action of the Commission. The creation of such arbitrary power is wholly unnecessary to the correction of any evil which has been developed. The possibilities of political and sectional strife growing out of its exercise are of the gravest character. Every consideration of justice and expediency demands a more conservative course. The Commission itself should be protected from the temptation of an exercise of such power which will surely come if it realizes that it has been given this authority without any control by the courts until the point is reached where the constitutional rights of the carrier are invaded.

Another very serious consideration, which has an important bearing upon the question of judicial review, is this: Under the power granted in the bill it is assumed the Commission will not undertake to change an entire schedule of rates by a single order. It will change a few rates by one order and a few more rates by another order. It is extremely doubtful, in view of recent decisions of the Supreme Court, as to when an order dealing with only one or a few rates of a carrier can be regarded as violating the constitutional rights of the carrier. This is strikingly shown by the case of Minneapolis and St. Louis R. R. Co. v. Minnesota (186 U. S., 257), a portion of the syllabus of which reads as follows:

A tariff fixed by the Commission for coal in carload lots is not proved to be unreasonable by showing that if such tariff were applied to all freight the road would not pay its operating expenses, since it might well be that the existing rates upon other merchandise, which were not disturbed by the Commission, might be sufficient to earn a large profit to the company, though it might earn little or nothing upon coal in carload lots.

In this connection it is wise to consider the language of the Supreme Court in the case of San Diego Land Co. v. National City (174 U. S., 739, 754):

But it should also be remembered that the judiciary ought not to interfere with the collection of rates established under legislative sanction, unless they are so plainly and palpably unreasonable as to make their enforcement equivalent to the taking of property for public use without such compensation as under all the circumstances is just both to the owner and to the public; that is, judicial interference should never occur unless the case presents, clearly and beyond all doubt, such a flagrant attack upon the rights of property under the guise of regulations as to compel the court to say that the rates prescribed will necessarily have the effect to deny just compensation for private property taken for the public use.

Such decisions as these strikingly illustrate the tremendous margin of discretion conferred upon the Commission under any system which leaves to judicial review solely the question whether the constitutional rights of the carrier have been violated.

In order to insure a judicial review which will adequately protect the property and interests involved, and which will operate as a conservative influence over the Commission itself, it is important for the act to define the Commission's jurisdiction and make it depend not upon the Commission's opinion, but upon the facts, and for the act to show that the Commission shall make no greater change than is necessary to prevent rates from being unreasonably high. This can be accomplished by authorizing the Commission to change rates only when the existing rates are unjust and unreasonable, and only so far as may be necessary to remove such injustice and unreasonableness. In this way it clearly becomes a judicial question for the court to determine whether the Commission has exceeded its jurisdiction, and if the Commission has exceeded its jurisdiction its order can be set aside. There is no other way in which Congress can make sure that an adequate judicial review can be provided.

While such provision would probably insure a fairly adequate judicial review, it would still be true that the Commission would possess a very substantial discretion. The courts would not interfere except where the Commission was clearly in the wrong. The carriers would realize that they could get no relief, either temporary or permanent, from the court unless they could show a clear case of abuse of discretion.

One further point to be considered is as to the suspension of the Commission's order pending final determination by the court, provided the court is of opinion that the order should be so suspended. It has been asserted with great confidence that Congress has absolute power to determine all details of jurisdiction and procedure by the Federal courts, and therefore to provide that the Federal courts shall not grant interlocutory injunctions or temporary restraining orders with respect to the rate-making orders of the Commission.

It is indeed a very serious question whether Congress, after it has invested a court of equity with jurisdiction over a given subject-matter, can then trim down that jurisdiction so that it can be exercised only on final hearing. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] in his very able argument made this very clear, and I do not know but that he used the very words "trimmed down," though I think he said "cut down." But this is a question entirely unnecessary to consider at this time. If it be conceded that under Article III of the Constitution, dealing with the judicial power of the United States, Congress can, in the way proposed, prohibit the courts from granting interlocutory injunctions or temporary restraining orders in proceedings to review rates made by the Commission, this throws absolutely no light upon what can and can not be done under the fifth amendment to the Constitution. If, by reason of the fifth amendment, it is a deprivation of property without due process of law or a taking of property without just compensation for Congress to compel a carrier perpetpually, or for three years, to carry freight for nothing or at less than the compensation which the courts may regard as meeting the constitutional requirements, certainly it is equally unconstitutional to take the property of the carrier in exactly the same way for six months, or three months, or three days.

If Congress, by the provision of heavy penalties, coerces a carrier into temporarily observing an unconstitutionally low rate and thereby in effect temporarily takes the carrier's property without due process of law or without just compensation, or if the result is accomplished, not by heavy penalties, but by depriving the carrier of any right to obtain temporary relief from the courts, there is unquestionably a palpable violation of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, and any act which has this effect would seem to be necessarily unconstitutional. This question would be in no wise affected by the entirely different question whether such action of Congress was or was not a violation of the provisions of Article III of the Constitution relative to the judicial power.

It should be remembered that whenever a carrier is compelled to carry freight for less than the rate which under the Constitution the carrier has the right to charge the loss thereby sustained by the carrier is absolute and irreparable. The observance of a given order might, for example, impose upon the carrier an average loss of $100 every week when compared with the lowest rate which the carrier could be constitutionally required to charge. This would be a loss of approximately $15,000 in the three years during which the order of the Commission was required to remain in effect. It is simply a contradiction in terms to say that the carrier has a constitutional right to be protected from this loss of $15,000 in three years, but no constitutional right to be protected from the loss of $100 per week for the six weeks or six months or twelve months which must intervene before the carrier can obtain a final determination by the court. The thing that is protected is the use of the carrier's property. The use for a single day is protected just as much as the use for three years. If the bill provided that the orders of the Commission should remain in effect only ten days, the carrier would still be as clearly entitled to judicial protection as it is where the order is to remain in effect for three years, and the case is of a character where the judicial protection must be had before the rate takes effect, because just as soon as the rate does take effect the irreparable loss begins, and where the rate is unconstitutionally low the unwarranted taking of the carrier's property without due process of law and without just compensation begins.

Mr. President, this great debate, which will stand in history as a monument to the ability and conservatism of the Senate, participated in by some of the ablest and most distinguished Senators who have ever adorned this illustrious body, and which has so instructed and illumined the country, has been for the most part along legal lines. In what I have said I have tried in a brief way, imperfect as it may be, to bring to the attention of the Senate and the country some of the practical workings of the bill. I realized, however, that no treatment of this great question, perhaps the most important economic question ever presented to the Senate, could omit some discussion of the legal principles involved. I felt that the subject had been almost exhausted, and I ventured with some hesitancy and much diffidence to follow the great speeches that have been made, knowing that I must touch upon some of the points which have been so ably discussed with more knowledge and far more ability than I possess.

Mr. GAMBLE obtained the floor.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, does the Senator propose to address the Senate on the pending bill?

Mr. GAMBLE. I do.

Mr. KEAN. Then I give notice that I shall submit some remarks on the pending bill after the Senator shall have concluded.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate with an extended discussion of the questions raised by the pending bill. The issues involved have already been most ably and exhaustively discussed. I trust I may not seem too presumptuous in asking the indulgence of the Senate, or in the observations I may make upon this most important subject.

In the discussion so far, it appears to be conceded that abuses have existed and do exist in railway management, and that an intelligent and honest effort should be made looking to their correction. Differences, however, do exist as to the remedies proposed and the manner under constitutional limitations in which these evils may be lawfully and most effectively reached.

That the Government possesses the plenary power, and that it can in some manner lawfully exercise it, it seems to me is beyond dispute. The form and manner of its exercise under the Constitution can, it occurs to me, be solved by the wisdom of this Congress along the lines proposed by the pending measure. The issue has been raised, and its wise and just solution is pressed upon this Congress. The interest of the people is so centered and insistent for the correction of the abuses complained of, an answer should be given by the enactment of a law at this session of Congress that will be responsive to the demand and that will effectively reach and to the fullest extent remove the evils that admittedly exist. No demand is made here for radical action or to make an unjust and unreasonable assault upon vested interests or property rights. It is to place in the concrete form of law, and to invoke only the lawful exercise of those powers inherent in every government for the protection of its citizens engaged in whatever calling, to give each an equal opportunity, and for the upbuilding and conservation of individual interests and communities as well as for the whole people of the entire nation.

The necessity for the proposed legislation is urgent and is demanded by the highest consideration of every public interest in behalf of the producing as well as the consuming classes of our population. Every interest of our people is dependent upon and interwoven with the problem of transportation. In this day and age every individual is affected by it. Every community is within its reach, and its transportation facilities and the rates charged make for its upbuilding or its undoing. The just and proper control and regulation of these great agencies of our business and commercial life means the giving of equal opportunity to the individual as well as to the community, with proper regard in the latter case to natural and commercial advantages.

The proposed legislation, with its honest observance by the carriers, would, I believe, produce substantial and wholesome results to our entire business and commercial interests and would promote in a large degree the uniform prosperity and well-being of the nation. The enormous powers possessed by these great corporations, and the great public agencies they subserve, affecting practically the market value of all products of whatever character and the values and interests of every locality and individual, make it of the highest importance to every interest of the people and of the nation that the power of the Federal Government should be recognized in effective regulation and control, so that these great instrumentalities for our commercial and material development may in the highest degree serve the purpose of their creation. While fair treatment and exact justice are sought for the people the same consideration should be accorded the carriers.

All recognize the vast interests involved, and of its interrelation with the whole fabric of our business and commercial life. A proposition that has to deal directly with the property rights of such vast magnitude and the correlated interests of the whole people of our entire country has had and will have the most serious consideration for its wise and just solution. A wrong done the transportation companies would have a direct, immediate, and like result upon the business interests of the country.

Their interests are so vast and their annual transactions so great they almost pass the limit of our comprehension. Of the railway mileage of the world, 550,000 miles, we possess 220,000, or two-fifths of the total. The gross earnings the past year amounted to $2,100,000,000. There are engaged in the railway service 1,300,000 employees. The wages paid those engaged in the railway service for the year 1904 were $817,598,810. The total valuation of the railways amounts to $11,250,000,000. The dividends declared and paid the past year were $230,000,000. The number of passengers carried by the railways for the year ending June 30, 1904, was 715,000,000, and they transported 1,309,000,000 tons of freight.

We are bewildered almost by the recital of these general statements. Aside, however, from their magnitude, how manifold and infinite are their transactions with the millions of individuals they serve and the communities they reach.

The railways have been most important factors in our economic and material development. The marvelous development of our interior, not accessible to water communication, has been made possible by the projection of the great arteries of commerce with infinite interlacing reaching from ocean to ocean. In many cases they preceded the settler. They extended into new and vast areas of our domain and made possible the rapid and marvelous growth of our material wealth, the acquisition to our strength as a people and to our integrity as a nation. With very much truth it has been said that—

Without the railroads three-fourths of the immense territory of the United States, situated too far from the sea and having insufficient communication by rivers or lakes, would be still almost deserts and would not play in the economic life of the world a more important part than Siberia did before being lifted from her isolation by the Trans-Siberian Railroad.

The States as well as the Federal Government have been most generous in their treatment of the railway corporations in the powers conferred through their charters as well as by direct grants. The control of these corporations both by the States and the General Government has, as a rule, been extremely lax. In the very nature of things, under the great stimulus of our marvelous development and with the concentration of such vast capital in the construction of railways and of the rivalry and competition thus engendered, abuses would develop seriously effecting the public welfare.

Many of the States sought to correct the evils, but State laws could only have application to a very limited amount of traffic, and it was found, if an efficient remedy was to be applied, recourse must be had through the Federal Government. The popular demand was so strong for the correction of the evils complained of that it finally resulted in the enactment of the interstate-commerce act of 1887. That this law has been productive of much good to the business and commercial world is not denied. It asserted the power of control by the Federal Government, that was a long step in advance. The position then taken by Congress, when that act was under consideration, was as vigorously and persistently resisted by the railways as the measure we now have before us. Dire results were prophesied then as now as to the effect of the proposed law on the interests of the railways and the business world.

The Interstate Commerce Commission construed the act of 1887 as granting to the Commission the power to fix rates for the future. The Commission exercised the power under the act. That construction, or the exercise of the power thereunder by the Commission, was not questioned by the railways for over ten years. As sustaining this, I quote the following from the annual report of the Commission for the year 1897:

The Commission exercised this power in a case commenced in the second month after its organization and continued to exercise it for a period of more than ten years, during which time no member of the Commission ever officially questioned the existence of such authority or failed to join in its exercise. As already stated, the authority of the Commission to modify and reduce an established rate and to enforce a reasonable rate for the future was not questioned in the answer of the defendant in the Atlantic Rate case, decided March 30, 1896, nor had it ever been denied in any answers made in more than four hundred previously commenced, many of them alleging unreasonable and unjust charges, and praying the Commission to enforce a reduction and lower the rates in the future.

Notwithstanding this legislation, and the power exercised under it by the Commission in fixing rates, and the explicit declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States that although the power was not conferred in the act yet Congress had power to exercise it, either directly or through a Commission, no dire results have befallen the railways, but instead it has been the era of their most marvelous prosperity and development, the like of which no other country or time can compare.

Mr. President, I do not have any misgivings as to the effect of the proposed legislation on railway property or railway interests. It has been apparent to anyone at all conversant with the conditions existing for the past year and upward that Congress would take cognizance of the question and that legislation along the lines proposed in the pending bill would be enacted. Notwithstanding this railway securities have in no way been depressed, nor have investments been discouraged therein. At no time in the history of the Government has there been greater confidence in these properties. Unusual investments have been made in betterments, in extensions, and in general railroad development. The literature published and sent broadcast by the railway interests to resist any and all legislation upon the subject has been appalling. The fears expressed and prophesies made as to the harmful effect of the proposed legislation does not seem to impress itself, so far, upon either the investments or the properties, or to discourage further development and extensions.

The demand for relief from the abuses complained of and which are sought to be corrected by this bill has been most insistent for many years. The need for correction has been admitted in this discussion. The declaration of the President in his annual message to Congress in 1904 very clearly stated the issue, as follows:

While I am of the opinion that at present it would be undesirable, if it were not impracticable, finally to clothe the Commission with the general authority to fix railroad rates, I do believe that, as a fair security to shippers, the Commission should be vested with the power, where a given rate has been challenged and after full hearing found to be unreasonable, to decide, subject to judicial review, what shall be a reasonable rate to take its place, the ruling of the Commission to take effect immediately, and to obtain unless and until it is reversed by the court of review.

It is upon this question the issue has been concentrated, both here and by the people. If relief is to be secured, it seems to me it can only come along the lines suggested and in the manner proposed by the pending bill. The issue was again stated and the necessities therefor were fully set out in the President's message of December last. By his decisive stand on this most absorbing question he has focused the attention of the whole country. No other subject so absorbs public attention at this hour.

In his message of 1905 the President again recommended conferring the power upon a competent administrative body to decide upon a case being brought before it, and after a full hearing if the rate then in force was found to be unreasonable and unjust "to prescribe the limit of rate beyond which it shall not be lawful to go—the 'maximum reasonable rate,' as it is commonly called—this decision to go into effect within a reasonable time and to obtain from thence onward, subject to review by the courts."

It is seen the President, both in the message of 1904 as well as in his message of 1905, took the position that the decisions made by the Commission should be subject to review by the courts.

No other construction, it seems to me, can be predicated upon the provisions of the pending bill. Differences, however, are entertained as to the extent to which the courts may be appealed to under its provisions.

It is asserted, however, with great force that the evils complained of can be corrected and the relief secured through the courts as already constituted with supplemental legislation in aid of the Elkins law. This in itself is an admission of the necessity for additional legislation and that the laws now in force are ineffectual to reach existing conditions.

The courts now are and have been open to litigants. But it must be conceded that the remedy is practically ineffective and largely abortive. The parties to the contest are unequal. The facts are largely in the possession of the railway company. Too often the shipper is practically at the mercy of the carrier. He hesitates to initiate a contest, fearing as a result the burdens upon him may be made more onerous. The amount involved as to the particular complaint may not be large, and he hesitates to enter into a contest that often concerns the community as well as himself, and he alone assume the responsibilities. The preferences given to a competitor may in itself be sufficient to overcome him and he is practically helpless. The delays incident to the litigation as a rule are so great that the relief, if secured, might be valueless under changed conditions.

That power is vested, and should be vested, somewhere in our governmental machinery to correct abuses and to control these great agencies of our commercial and business interests for the benefit of the whole people must be conceded. That the courts have proved ineffectual and must, it occurs to me, under any scheme, be ineffectual to reach and correct the evils with that promptness and efficiency the very nature of the relief sought demands can not be answered. I do not make this as a charge against the integrity or competency of our courts. The character of the investigations to be made, the multiplicity of related facts to be considered, and with the time taken and the delays incident to court procedure make it, in the very nature of the case, impossible to secure the relief desired with that dispatch and promptness the business and interests demand.

The Constitution vests in the legislative department of the Federal Government the power to regulate commerce between the States:

The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes. (Sec. 8, Art. I.)

The power thus granted to Congress to regulate commerce carries with it the power to prescribe the rule by which it shall be governed and the conditions upon which it shall be conducted. This rule has at different times been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States.

This power to regulate applies to the subject of commerce as well as to the instrumentalities of commerce. It applies not alone to its regulation in these respects, but to the compensation for the service rendered. In the case of Philadelphia Steamship Company v. Pennsylvania (122 U. S., 338) it was held:

The very object of engaging in transportation is to receive pay for it. If the regulation of the transportation belongs to the power of Congress to regulate commerce, the regulation of fares and freights receivable for such transportation must equally belong to that power.

The principle contended for was asserted and established by the courts of England more than a century ago. Chief Justice Waite, in the case of Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113), gives a most interesting statement as to the rule under the common law and the development of the principle in that country both through legislation and the courts. He quotes a very suggestive preamble from a statute passed as long ago as the third year of the reign of William and Mary, as follows:

And whereas divers wagoners and other carriers, by combination amongst themselves, have raised the prices of carriage of goods in many places to excessive rates to the great injury of the trade: Be it therefore enacted, etc.

Legislation to correct the evils complained of appears from the recital of the facts to have been necessary even at that time, and the principle was sustained by the courts of England. The principles laid down by the Chief Justice in the above case were of the utmost importance, and the assertion of the power of public control over the subject-matter involved by that great court, though at that time divided, has since been acquiesced in and followed. It was held in this case:

1. Under the powers inherent in every sovereignty a government may regulate the conduct of its citizens toward each other, and, when necessary for the public good, the manner in which each shall use his own property.

2. It has, in the exercise of these powers, been customary in England from time immemorial and in this country from its first colonization to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, etc., and, in so doing, to fix a maximum of charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations, and articles sold.

3. Down to the time of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States it was not supposed that statutes regulating the use, or even the price of the use, of private property necessarily deprived an owner of his property without due process of law. Under some circumstances they may, but not under all. The amendment does not change the law in this particular; it simply prevents States from doing that which will operate as such deprivation.

4. When the owner of property devotes it to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in such use, and must to the extent of that submit to be controlled by the public for the common good as long as he maintains the use. He may withdraw this grant by discontinuing the use.

Following the above, and decided at the same term, is the case of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company v. Iowa (94 U. S., 155), in which it was held that—

Railroads are carriers for hire. Engaged in a public employment affecting the public interest, they are, unless protected by their charters, subject to legislative control as to their rates of fares and freight.

The same doctrine was reasserted in the case of Peil v. Railway Co. (94 U. S., at 178). The court said:

Where property has been clothed with a public interest the legislature may fix a limit to that which shall in law be reasonable for its use. This limit binds the courts as well as the people. If it has been improperly fixed, the legislature, not the courts, must be appealed to for the change.

The foregoing cases had relation to the power of State legislatures in the fixing of rates of fare and freight within the State. That Congress has the same power to deal with the subject, under the Constitution—with interstate rates—as State legislatures have within their limitation seems to me beyond dispute. This position has been repeatedly sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The power to fix rates must be conceded to be a legislative function, and that power, under the Constitution, is vested in Congress. To deny the power is practically to admit that corporations of this class are a law unto themselves upon the question of rate making and that the people are without any substantial remedy. Resort to the courts, as I have before stated, I believe is ineffectual, and it has been demonstrated to be such by experience.

It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the legislature may declare the rule of law that rates must be just, fairly remunerative, or otherwise, and authorize an administrative body or commission to fix and establish the rates or practice in conformity to the rule so established. In the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. (154 U. S., at 393) the court states:

There can be no doubt of the general power of a State to regulate the fares and freight which may be charged and received by railroad or other carriers, and that this regulation can be carried on by means of a commission. Such a commission is merely an administrative board created by the State for carrying into effect the will of the State as expressed by its legislature.

The rule was still more clearly announced in the case of Commerce Commission v. C. N. O. and T. P. Rwy. Co. (167 U. S., at 494), wherein the power of Congress as to the fixing of rates, directly or through a commission, is fully declared by the court. Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, said:

There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration: Congress might itself prescribe the rates, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty, or it might leave the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule, which is as old as the existence of common law, to wit, that rates must be reasonable. * * * Administrative control over railroads through boards or commissions was no new thing. It had been resorted to in England and in many of the States of the Union. In England, while control had been given in respect to discrimination and undue preferences, no power had been given to prescribe a tariff of rates. In this country the practice had been varying.

In the same case it was held by the court that it was a judicial act to inquire whether the rates which had been charged and collected were reasonable. On the other hand, it was a legislative act to prescribe rates which should be charged in the future. This same doctrine has been repeatedly asserted by the Supreme Court of the United States and by many of the supreme courts of the different States.

Nor shall any person * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation. (Fifth amendment to the Constitution.)

This amendment limits the power of Congress in the exercise of the right conferred by the Constitution. When this power is exceeded the courts can intervene and protect the rights that are sought to be invaded. These rights, being guaranteed and protected by the Constitution, can not be disregarded by the legislative branch of the Federal Government. Nor do I believe could this power be withdrawn from the courts by any legislative device. Rights under the amendment are constitutional guaranties, and no act of the legislative branch of the Government could deprive the court of jurisdicion in which any question might be properly raised thereunder.

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. (Fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.)

This amendment places the limitation upon the State legislatures, and in case of its invasion jurisdiction attaches to the courts of the United States. Under the Constitution the judicial power of the United States is vested in a Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. While the latter courts exist and possess the powers conferred upon them by Congress under the Constitution, the guaranty given and the protection accorded by this amendment can not, in my judgment, be limited nor abridged by legislation. They would be open, I believe, to litigants without further amendment to the proposed bill for the protection of those rights guaranteed to them under these constitutional provisions.

For my part, Mr. President, I am anxious that in the proposed legislation the remedy provided to correct the evils complained of shall be efficient, speedy, and effective. If every order issued by the Commission is to be subject to judicial review and its enforcement suspended until the subject-matter is finally disposed of through the courts, with the delays incident thereto, I fear the legislation will be most disappointing. It will fail to satisfy the commercial and business interests of the country that have been most insistent for relief. I would be entirely willing, however, that the matter should be put beyond cavil or question, and that an explicit provision should be engrafted in the bill conferring affirmative jurisdiction on the courts to hear and determine whether the order or decision complained of was beyond the authority of the Commission or in violation of the rights of the carriers secured by the Constitution. This would relieve the bill from the doubts suggested as to its constitutionality in this regard, and the jurisdiction, which is conceded by the friends of the bill to be implied from its provisions, would then be affirmatively recognized in specific terms.

No one desires legislation that will not stand the test of judicial interpretation. The legislation sought is of vast consequence and reaches most important interests. Every important feature of its provisions has had and should have the utmost consideration. The law may not, and probably will not, accomplish all we expect. If possible it must be enacted in that form most certain to demonstrate its efficiency.

There is no disposition to be unjust to the carriers. They have rights guaranteed them the same as to individuals by the Constitution and by the law. The rights of the shippers and of the public should have the same consideration. There is no suggestion in the bill, and especially with the amendment proposed, of the denial of any right to either person or property of the fullest constitutional protection. Resort to the courts, even without amendment, is recognized by the provisions of the bill. To deny the right of judicial review upon those grounds guaranteed by the Constitution would be held to be an attempt to take property without just compensation, and certainly if exercised would amount to the taking of property without due process of law.

In the case of Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 418), wherein the construction of an act of that State in which the railway commission was authorized to fix rates of charges and that they should be final and conclusive as to their reasonablenes, and should not be open to judicial inquiry as to their reasonableness, the court said:

> This being the construction of the statute by which we are bound in considering the present case, we are of the opinion that, so construed, it conflicts with the Constitution of the United States in the particulars complained of by the railroad company. It deprives the company of its right to a judicial investigation by due process of law, under the forms and with the machinery provided by the wisdom of successive ages for the investigation judicially of the truth of a matter in controversy, and substitutes therefor, as an absolute finality, the action of a railroad commission which, in view of the powers conceded to it by the State court, can not be regarded as clothed with judicial functions or possessing the machinery of a court of justice.

This decision has been frequently referred to in this debate. To my mind, with any fair construction of the provisions of the pending bill, the principle laid down therein, which no one questions, can not have application. As the bill comes to us from the House the right of the carrier to apply to the courts is expressly recognized. With the amendment suggested jurisdiction would be affirmatively extended. With the rights of the carrier thus secured, and having an opportunity to go into the courts to test the lawfulness of the order or decision of the Commission, or as to whether its constitutional rights had been invaded, no claim could be made that the action of the Commission must be accepted as "an absolute finality," or that the rights of the carrier under the Constitution had not been preserved.

Even if it were attempted, Congress could not deprive the courts of jurisdiction of those rights guaranteed by the Constitution. If I understand the position taken by the friends of this measure, the above contention is not disputed. Under the provisions of the bill jurisdiction of the courts is recognized, and that parties aggrieved by any decision or order of the Commission, at least within the constitutional protection, may seek redress therein, and hence its validity could be impeached for the foregoing reasons.

In my judgment there should be safeguards provided in the bill requiring notice to be given to the Commission and other parties in interest, and an opportunity for a full hearing had before any injunction order should be granted suspending a decision or order of the Commission. Constitutional guaranties in every way must be recognized, and the interests of the public, the shipper, and the carrier alike be protected. No other disposition has been manifested so far in this debate.

The question before us, Mr. President, is neither new nor unusual. Most of the States of the Union have invoked the same power in the fixing of rates and fares, and have exercised it through a commission, as is proposed in this bill. These laws and the manner of their exercise have been sustained by the highest courts of the respective States and by the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is not proposed, as it has been so persistently asserted by those conducting the campaign in opposition to this legislation, to give to the Commission power to fix any and all rates at their discretion, or to alter or reform, upon their own motion, any or all practices of the carriers.

> It is the duty of the Commission, and it shall have power, whenever, after full hearing upon a complaint made as provided by this act, it shall be of the opinion that any of the rates or charges or any regulations or practices are unjust or unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential or prejudicial, to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be a just and reasonable and fairly remunerative rate or rates * * * to be thereafter observed in such case as the maximum to be charged * * * and to make an order that the carrier shall cease and desist from such violation. * * * Such order shall go into effect thirty days after notice to the carrier.

It is not proposed to give to the Commission power to initiate rates. This is left with the carrier, as it should be. The bill leaves the carriers free to manage their affairs as heretofore, looking to the development of their business, the protection of their property, the increase of business, and to control their great interests with the same freedom they heretofore have had, and shall be restrained only from doing those things that in good conscience and public morals they should not do even without the necessity of statutory prohibition.

With the law enacted and the right asserted, and the consciousness and knowledge by the carriers of this power of effective control and regulation, I believe many of the complaints now existing will be removed by the carriers themselves. I trust they may largely disappear upon the initiation of the railways themselves.

Private car lines, industrial roads, terminal facilities of whatever character, refrigerator charges and the like must and should be covered by the provisions of this bill. From their management and control great abuses have arisen and against which most serious complaints have been made. The facts disclosed in many instances, where investigations have been made, show most flagrant exactions and practices imposed upon shippers.

It is claimed that under existing law railway abuses have largely disappeared, and there is no necessity for further legislation. Railway rates have been greatly reduced in this country from what they were in years past. For many years there was a gradual downward tendency so that as a general proposition there is no general complaint against excessive or relatively high rates throughout the country as a whole. In this respect passenger and freight rates bear a most favorable comparison with those of any other country. In comparison with European countries the distances are greater and the advantages in this respect are in our favor. It is admitted, however, that for the past few years rates have been on the increase. This is also shown from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was asserted a few days since by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], if the same rule were applied in the keeping of accounts for all commodities actually carried by the railways, that freight rates in Prussia are lower than the average rates in this country.

It can hardly be claimed that we have yet reached the ideal state as to this most important feature of railroad management, and that no readjustments or modifications are necessary.

Although much has been accomplished by the Elkins Act on the subject of rebates, it can not be claimed that this evil has been eradicated. With the fuller powers given to the Commission in this bill, and with the enlarged jurisdiction extended over all related instrumentalities connected with transportation, I believe it will have a most wholesome effect and will strengthen the present law looking to the correction of this evil.

Discriminations are still practiced and no claim is made that they do not prevail. The injustice done both communities and shippers in this respect goes almost unchallenged. To correct these evils, and that parties and communities may have some effective forum wherein they may be heard for the adjustment and arbitrament of their claims is not only reasonable but just.

It must be assumed, Mr. President, the Commission will seek to deal justly with individuals and communities as well as with the carriers. That there should be some tribunal before which their rights may be properly and equitably adjusted with full regard to the interests of all parties concerned seems self-evident. The carrier is not justified in assuming the position of sole arbiter over these questions of such vast moment to communities as well as individuals and have regard alone to its own interests. The Government is warranted, as it is its duty, in the creation of an impartial tribunal before which all interests may be represented and that exact justice may be administered and all interests protected.

I am not disposed to inveigh against railroads or corporate or vested rights. They, however, are the servants of the public. They owe their creation and their power to the State. They should serve the people with due regard to the interests and welfare of the public, and in good faith carry out the purposes of their creation. They owe the public fair and just treatment. This should be conceded. The proposed legislation asks for nothing more.

With the amount of invested capital engaged in transportation, with its dominant influence in financial as well as in political affairs, with the great interests it serves and its relation to our commercial and economic development, and the dependence of our whole people upon a proper, fair, and just service, legislation along the lines proposed by the pending bill, asserting a proper and effective governmental control and regulation, is emphasized and justified by the highest motives for our national well-being and of patriotism.

The immense mileage of the railways may practically be divided into eight extensive systems. These systems control substantially 70 per cent of the entire railway mileage of the country and 75 per cent of the traffic. Many of these systems, and the controlling influences therein, are predominant in others. It occurs to me, Mr. President, the Government should assert itself and meet the issues these vast responsibilities suggest.

This is the forum where it is to be debated and decided. I have confidence in the wisdom and the patriotism of Congress and that it will meet the expectations of the country with a disposition of the question in the interest of the whole people.

I am strongly persuaded, unless the substantial questions raised by the pending bill are met and solved, and solved fairly, with full recognition of the rights and obligations of every interest and of the people as a whole in the proper regulation and control of railways, we will very soon be confronted with serious problems so far untried in our governmental experience. If the people can not assert and secure and effectively maintain governmental regulation and control, they will be disposed to enter upon, possess, and manage in their own right, under governmental proprietorship, these great agencies of commercial and business necessities.

With such a movement I do not and could not sympathize. Legislation along the lines proposed by the pending measure, I believe, is the only effective agency to arrest and prevent the development and growth of such a stupendous proposal.

Mr. President, I believe Congress, and especially this Senate, is conscious of the vast responsibilities imposed upon it in the enactment of this measure. Outside of and independent of the evils to be corrected, the interests conserved or the remedies proposed, it means the assertion of and the maintenance of those principles underlying the foundations of the Government, that establish justice, secure liberty to persons and to property, insure peace and orderly development, and the promotion of the general welfare of the whole people.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, yesterday the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] made the following statement:

> I have considered the fixing of a railroad rate through the Commission as an act of Congress. I can find no authority in the Constitution for the exercise of the power to regulate interstate commerce except that power which is conferred upon the Congress; and I have been driven by long meditation to the conclusion that whatever else this order of the Commission is, it is an act of Congress; for Congress has the only power conferred by the Constitution to regulate commerce between the States.

Upon that proposition, Mr. President, I propose to submit a few remarks, not very lengthy, this afternoon, and I trust the Senate will bear with me for a few moments.

For this bill, amended or unamended, I can find no justification, so long as its leading purpose is adhered to. There are two or three things as self-evident, at least, as the truths stated in the Declaration of Independence.

We are assembled here under the Constitution of the United States. Except for its force, what we say or do is without effect. Although elsewhere it may be treated as an ancient, lingering useless upon the stage, whose words need not be heeded, here in the Senate of the United States, where that instrument is the only source of authority, it must be remembered that the limits of authority as thereby fixed must be observed.

We are engaged in the business of legislating, acting under the authority of Article I of the Constitution, which deals only with legislative powers; under section 1, which reads as follows:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

And under section 8, which defines the "legislative power herein granted."

The particular legislative power which we propose to exercise is that defined in subdivision 3 of section 8:

> To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

The only power of Congress in the premises, then, is to regulate such commerce by legislation. If by enacting this bill we attempt to do anything but ourselves to regulate such commerce and to regulate it by legislation, then such enactment is beyond our power as fixed by the Constitution.

I assume that the power to regulate commerce includes the power to prescribe rates or to make rules for fixing rates to be charged for transportation. But I ask, Where in this bill is there any exercise of this power? Where in its provisions are rates prescribed or regulated by Congress, to which alone this power is given by the Constitution?

Section 15 tells who are to prescribe rates and in this respect to regulate commerce—the Interstate Commerce Commission. When the Commission shall be of the opinion that rates charged are unjust and unreasonable, then this Commission shall determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be just and reasonable rates to be thereafter observed, and shall order the carrier not to exceed the rates so prescribed, and such order the carrier is required to obey.

Section 16 provides remedies and penalties for disobedience of the orders of the Commission—damage to shippers, and forfeiture to the Government of $5,000 for each offense. By whom, I ask, is commerce to be so regulated? Is it not clearly by the Commission? Action is to be taken when it "shall be of the opinion." The Commission is to determine and prescribe what will, in its judgment, be just and reasonable rates, and penalties attach for disobedience, not of the commands of Congress, but by the orders of the Commission. Congress exercises no judgment, forms no opinion, determines nothing, prescribes nothing, orders nothing. All these things are to be done by the Commission. If Congress ought to prescribe rates or to regulate rates, then by this bill it simply attempts to shirk its duty and to delegate to a Commission functions which belong to it (Congress) alone, and the attempt must be futile and accomplish nothing outside the field of politics, for the Constitution authorizes no such delegation of power. The power to regulate commerce is given only to Congress and not to any other body of whatever nature, administrative or judicial; it is given only as a legislative power, one of the legislating powers which the Constitution declares "shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." Is it doubted that the power here sought to be given to the Commission is a legislative power?

In Texas and Pacific Railway Company v. Interstate Commerce Commission (162 U. S., 215), in which the question arose whether the act as it now is gives the Commission power to prescribe rates, Mr. Justice Shiras called this a "legislative power." And again, in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railroad (167 U. S., 479), in which the same question was more carefully considered, Mr. Justice Brewer said:

> It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable—that is a judicial act; but an entirely different thing to prescribe rates that shall be charged in the future—that is a legislative act.

And he further says:

> The power given is to execute and enforce, not to legislate. The power given is partly judicial, partly executive and administrative, but not legislative.

And in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Alabama Midland Railway Company (168 U. S., 161) the power of prescribing rates is again called a "legislative power" by Mr. Justice Shiras. The very power which was considered in these cases it is now proposed to give to the Commission. If this was a legislative power when the Supreme Court denied that Congress had undertaken to give it to the Commission, now that it is proposed that Congress shall give it to them, is its nature changed? Is it not still a legislative power? Is it not one of those legislative powers which the Constitution has vested exclusively in the Congress of the United States? If this power be a legislative power, authority is hardly needed for the proposition that it can be exercised by Congress only. This would seem to be clear from the words of the Constitution. But hear what Judge Cooley, the first chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and a recognized authority on constitutional limitations, says in his work (6th ed., p. 137):

> One of the settled maxims in constitutional law is that the power conferred upon the legislature to make laws can not be delegated by that department to any other body or authority. Where the sovereign power of the State has located the authority there it must remain, and by the constitutional agency alone the laws must be made until the Constitution itself is changed.

In Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649–692) Mr. Justice Harlan says:

> That Congress can not delegate legislative powers to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution.

I am aware that the Supreme Court has recognized the validity of State laws empowering State commissions to fix rates, but I think they have done so only under the controlling decisions of the State courts. Certainly they have never held that any such delegation of legislative power could be made under the Constitution of the United States. Congress must do its own legislating. It can not turn the power and the responsibility—and the trouble, if you please—over to any other body or authority.

But it is argued that section 1 of the bill, or the similar language of the act now in force, does the work of regulating by legislation, and that sections 15 and 16 provide only a method for making such legislation effective.

Let us see what there is of such legislative regulation in section 1. Nothing but this:

> All charges made for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, shall be just and reasonable, and every unjust and unreasonable charge for such service, or any part thereof, is prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

This, then, is the whole foundation of legislative regulation to support the provisions of sections 15 and 16. If this is not sufficient regulation by legislation to justify the provisions of sections 15 and 16, then they can find no justification at all.

Suppose that a bill had been introduced containing only this sentence and a provision that a violation of this provision should be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or by imprisonment. Would such a bill be seriously considered here? Would this be seriously regarded as regulation by legislation? As well might Congress enact that the Golden Rule should be followed in all matters of interstate commerce and impose a penalty for its violation. As well might it provide that all interstate carriers should be good and prohibit them from being bad. Would any such enactment be deemed to be regulation by legislation? Upon such an enactment could we justify the creation of a commission to form an opinion, to determine and prescribe and declare according to its judgment what specific conduct should be deemed to violate the act, to make the prohibition definite and certain, and to issue its orders accordingly, to have the force of law and make applicable the fines and penalties provided? Substantially this provision, the only legislative regulation of rates in the pending bill, has been on the statute books for nineteen years.

By section 10, act of 1887 (which it is not proposed by this bill to change), any violation of the act is made a misdemeanor punishable by fine. Have numerous prosecutions been taken under it? Have any been successful? If there have been no unjust and unreasonable charges made, where is the demand for the legislation now proposed? If unjust and unreasonable charges have been so frequent as to call for such legislation—and the act as it is makes them criminal—then what shall we say of the law officers of the Government? But the Department of Justice has not been at fault in this respect. This sentence can not properly be called legislation. No crime is thereby charged; no crime is thereby defined.

It would certainly be dangerous if the legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders and leave it to the courts to step inside and say who could be rightfully detained and who should be set at large. This would to some extent substitute the judicial for the legislative departments of the Government. (United States v. Reese, 92 U. S., 214.)

Congress can delegate legislative power neither by using vague language having no distinct meaning nor by making such delegation expressly. It can not one way or the other transfer to any other body or authority its legislative power. That it can not by vague language put upon the courts the duty of completing legislation is not because of any limitations of the courts, but because Congress can not delegate legislative power to any other body or authority. As this prohibition contained in the sentence quoted has during these nineteen years furnished no basis for judicial action, so, in like manner, it can form no basis for empowering the Commission to fix rates, upon the theory that in so doing the Commission will exercise only administrative functions to make effective this prohibition that rates must not be "unjust and unreasonable."

The sentence quoted from secton 1, if this bill be passed, will continue as ineffective as it has been during the last nineteen years. Effective regulation of rates will result only from the orders of the Commission. These orders are to be made, not as called for by any definite principles laid down by Congress, applied to the mere facts to be found by the Commission. They are to be made according to the "opinion," according to the "judgment," according to the "determination" of the Commission. Are these merely administrative functions? Are they only executive machinery to make effective rules prescribed by Congress? If so, I am at a loss to know what limit there is to the delegation of the powers of Congress—how far we may go by substituting government by commission for government by law. When Congress shall have enacted regulations of definite meaning it may doubtless provide for action by an administrative or a judicial body to aid in making such legislation effective; but no body, except Congress itself, can either prescribe rates or lay down the rules upon which rates must be fixed.

It may be said that it is difficult for Congress to determine the rules or principles upon which rates shall be fixed; that the subject is too complicated for Congressional action. Does such a suggestion tend in any degree to justify this bill? The courts have found difficulty in determining what are reasonable rates.

In Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company v. Tompkins (176 U. S., 167) Mr. Justice Brewer says:

Few cases are more difficult or perplexing than those which involve an inquiry whether the rates prescribed by a State legislature for the carriage of passengers and freight are unreasonable, and yet this difficulty affords no excuse for a failure to examine and solve the questions involved.

Much more difficult is it to lay down rules and principles upon which rates may properly be prescribed. But does this afford any excuse for turning over the business of legislation to a commission? If rules and principles are to be followed in prescribing rates, may they not be determined by Congress after such investigation as may be had as truly as they can be determined by the Commission after like investigation? Or will it be confessed that this business of fixing rates for transportation can not be dealt with by any governmental authority according to rules and principles, but must be dealt with arbitrarily from time to time by some such body as the Interstate Commerce Commission? If this is confessed, let us heed the words of the Supreme Court in the case of Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U. S., 356–359), as follows:

When we consider the nature and the theory of our institutions of Government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power.

In the view I take, the bill can not be justified though it be so amended as to provide for judicial review of the action of the Commission. Legislative power can not be delegated either to a commission or to the courts or to a commission whose acts are subject to judicial review or to commission and courts together, simply because such power can not be delegated at all.

But I can not close my eyes to the light which is thrown upon the character of the proposed legislation by all this anxiety upon the part of the most ardent supporters of this bill to shield the action of the Commission from judicial criticism.

We rightly pride ourselves upon the independence and ability of our judiciary throughout our national history. We have not forgotten that the Supreme Court of the United States is the bulwark of the Constitution; we still look to the courts for justice.

I will not believe that there has come a change in the attitude of the people to the courts. Should the respect of the courts go, we might as well abandon our experiment in free government. What, then, is to be gained from the attempt to bar the courts from reviewing the acts of the Commission under this bill? Is it not that the nature of the business to be put upon the Commission is such that it is realized that it can not be done by rules and according to well-considered principles, but must be done arbitrarily, according to the changing notions of the Commission? This bill is an attempt to delegate to a commission the legislative power of Congress, and this anxiety to bar judicial review is a confession that such power when so delegated must, in the nature of the case, be exercised arbitrarily and not in such manner as to be able to stand the scrutiny of the court. The courts of justice are to be closed lest the Commission be convicted of injustice. It may be the people care little for legality in these days, that constitutional limitations sit lightly, if at all, upon the common conscience. But I believe that when that conscience is aroused it will condemn us if we attempt such a departure as is proposed by this bill from the fundamental principles of government under the Constitution.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 191) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone line in the district of Alaska.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the unfinished business is laid aside for the day I should like to make some inquiry as to the order of business to-morrow. I have made inquiry of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, and I do not hear of anyone who is prepared to speak on the bill to-morrow. If I am mistaken I should be glad to know it. In regard to the debate for next week, as far as I have been able to learn, it occurs to me that most Senators on this side, perhaps, will get through next week—all of them, as far as I know, who expect to speak on the general subject in set speeches.

I should like to suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who seems to be by common consent in the control of those who are opposing this bill, or guiding or managing it for that side, whether he is now prepared to offer any idea as to when we can get a vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood that the Senator from South Carolina was himself opposing the bill, and I do not know why he suggests that I am opposing the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I am mistaken in the Senator's attitude and he is going to vote for it at last, I beg his pardon and withdraw the remark.

Mr. ALDRICH. I expect it to be amended in such a form that I shall be very glad to vote for it, and I hope the Senator from South Carolina will be found to be voting in the same way.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from South Carolina are found voting together for this bill, then I will be very much astonished.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will not abandon it, if proper and just amendments are made to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I will try——

Mr. ALDRICH. I confess I have some doubt on that subject. I do not know where the Senator will be arrayed when the bill is perfected.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will try to give my support to any amendment, from whatever source it may come, that, in my judgment, will go to perfecting the bill and giving the country the relief which we feel, or some of us feel, is demanded. If the Senator from Rhode Island has an amendment which he wants to offer, which commends itself to my judgment as being a good one, I shall certainly be glad to give my vote for it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I voted to place the bill in the charge of the Senator from South Carolina, having great confidence in his judgment, intelligence, and discretion. I have watched his course upon it with great interest from day to day, and I must confess he has left more or less doubt upon my mind about what his real attitude is. If, as I hope and believe, both of us are able to vote for such amendments as may perfect the bill, in the end both may be found voting for the measure.

Mr. TILLMAN. What about the time for a vote?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think it is hardly time yet.

Mr. TILLMAN. Could the Senator give me within, say, two weeks of the time—say the 1st of May, or somewhere about there?

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator what is to be the course of the discussion next week? How many speeches are to be——

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] is to speak Monday and the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] will speak Tuesday. Some other Senator, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], I believe, says he wants to speak on Wednesday. I have understood from the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that he would speak some time in the near future, though no specified day was mentioned. As I said, as far as I can learn, practically all the Senators on this side who have indicated any purpose of speaking at all will be through next week, and, unless the Senator can indicate what speeches will be made on the other side, I do not see why we can not begin to contemplate a day for the vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. Just as soon as those speeches are made——

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. PETTUS. If the debate on this subject is not to be continued, I should like to make a request to take up a bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. As soon as we have disposed of the question as to whether we shall adjourn over until Monday or continue the debate to-morrow, or whether we can fix a time for a vote, I shall be very glad to get out of the way of the Senator from Alabama or whoever else wishes to call up a bill, and let them have the floor, because I do not want to occupy it.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, does the Senator from South Carolina undertake to say that Senators who desire to amend this bill are therefore to be classified as opposing the bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I did not say or even hint such a thing, merely for the reason that I want to put at least half a dozen amendments on it myself.

Mr. SPOONER. That is why I wanted to direct the Senator's attention to what the Senator did say. He not only said that, but he spoke of Senators being "controlled."

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not use my language as guardedly as the Senator from Wisconsin does his. I know nobody controls that side or this side.

Mr. SPOONER. That is true.

Mr. TILLMAN. And if the Senator objects to the word "control," I will say that I was simply suggesting, controlling or directing or guiding or counseling, or whatever word will suit the Senator, the general course of discussion, and the question of when it was going to get to an end.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator used an expression which I knew he would withdraw.

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly I withdraw it, because it is not accurate, and I do not want to be inaccurate, although I am very often so, I suppose, in the niceties of language.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know any man who can be nicer than the Senator from South Carolina when he thinks for a moment of time and considers what he says.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I sat down to write a nice note to the Senator from Wisconsin, I think I might use language that probably would be calculated to pass muster in that line.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has said a great deal to me in the heat of debate that has been very agreeable and pleasant and complimentary.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thank the Senator for the compliment. I really have no malice toward anybody, but when I once get into a discussion I get earnest, though I do not want to say anything to wound.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought the Senator might, on reading his observations in the RECORD in the morning, find that he had used a term that he did not mean, and I wanted to call his attention to it.

Mr. McLAURIN. I desire to give notice that, if I can get the floor on Monday next, I shall submit some remarks on what is known as the "railroad rate bill."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At what time?

Mr. McLAURIN. At the conclusion of the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The notice of the Senator from Mississippi will be entered.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to give notive that I will attempt to get the floor on Monday to follow the Senator from Mississippi on the same bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The notice of the Senator from Alabama will be entered.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTUS. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be glad to have the unfinished business laid aside for the rest of the day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take up for consideration the bill (S. 2355) to organize the corps of dental surgeons attached to the Medical Department of the Army.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first recognize the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM], who made a request for the present consideration of a bill. After that bill is disposed of, the Chair will recognize the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS].

Mr. HALE. What is the regular order, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order has been laid aside, and the Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a certain bill.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BURNHAM. Certainly.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] does not propose to bring the rate bill up for consideration to-morrow, there being no one——

Mr. TILLMAN. The only reason I shall not ask for the consideration of the bill to-morrow is that I know of no one who wishes to speak on it.

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to add, because there is no one ready to discuss the bill. That being the situation as respects the bill, I know of no special reason why the Senate should sit to-morrow. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR ORVILLE H. PLATT.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY] to the fact that the 14th of April had been selected at his request for memorial services on our late colleague, the former Senator from Connecticut, Mr. PLATT. I understand that on that day there is another service to take place, on the House side of this Capitol. I therefore think it would be well, if the Senator be willing to do so, to fix another day, a week from the time heretofore selected, on which the memorial services shall take place.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President, the Senate will remember that I originally requested that the 7th of April be selected for eulogies on my late colleague, Senator PLATT; but on that day ceremonies were to take place in connection with one of our buildings. I therefore asked the Senate to change the date for the memorial services until the 14th day of April; and now, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which I think is entirely proper, I will ask the Senate that the memorial services over my late colleague take place on Saturday, April 21.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's notice will be entered.

ALASKAN RAILROAD, TELEGRAPH, AND TELEPHONE LINE.

Mr. BURNHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 191) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph and telephone line in the district of Alaska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I know debate is not in order on the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, but I want to say a word about it. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I think the request for the consideration of this bill is inopportune at this time. The bill will give rise to considerable discussion, I have no doubt, unless some amendments are made to it. The bill is to grant a right of way to a railroad company in Alaska. There are certain amendments which I desire made to the bill, and I think other Senators desire that amendments shall be made to it. I have had some talk with the Senator from New Hampshire about some amendments which I wish made to the bill, but I have had no time to formulate them. I do not know whether the Senator is ready to accept them or not. If not, I shall make objection to the passage of the bill, but I do not wish to make objection to its consideration. I do not think, however, this is a good time to ask for its consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator not let the bill be read?

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to letting the bill be read, reserving my right to make objection to its consideration afterwards.

Mr. BURNHAM. Mr. President, I desire to say that I should like progress made in the consideration of this bill. If the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] wishes to propose amendments to it, it is possible they might be accepted if presented; but at least I trust we may have the bill read, as it is of considerable length.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest that the bill be read, and then that it go over. I will see what I can do in the way of preparing my amendments after it is read.

Mr. BURNHAM. Very well, let the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Territories with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That William L. Bull, Grant B. Schley, Winthrop Smith, William S. McLean, Sabin W. Colton, jr., W. Frederick Snyder, Irving A. Stearns, William M. Barnum, William B. Kurtz, Charles P. Hunt, Ernest Thalmann, James H. Wilson, Samuel M. Felton, John H. McGraw, Andrew F. Burleigh, and all such other persons who shall or may be associated with them, and their successors, are hereby created and erected into a body corporate and politic in deed and in law by the name, style, and title of the "Alaska Railroad Company," and by that name shall have perpetual succession and shall be able to sue and to be sued in all courts of law and equity within the United States and its Territories, and to make and have a common seal. And said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad, telegraph, and telephone line and branches, with the appurtenances, namely: Beginning at a point on the Gulf of Alaska, at or near the head of Cordova Bay, in the district of Alaska, thence by the most eligible route, as shall be determined by said company, within the territory of the United States, to a point on the Yukon River at or within 2 miles of Eagle; and is hereby vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act as herein set forth. The capital stock of said company may consist of 200,000 shares of $100 each, all of the same class and grade, or of such lesser amount as the board of directors of said company may by by-laws determine, which said stock shall, in all respects, be deemed personal property, and shall be transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said corporation shall provide. The persons hereinbefore named are hereby appointed and constituted the first directors of said corporation, to hold their said offices until their successors are duly elected, at the first stockholders' meeting, to be held as hereinafter provided, and qualify, of whom seven shall be a quorum for the transaction of business, which said stockholders' meeting shall be held within six months after the passage of this act. The board of directors of said corporation, after the board hereinbefore constituted as the first board of directors, shall consist of nine persons, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, and said board of directors shall be invested with all the corporate powers of said company. The first meeting of said first board of directors shall be held at such time and place in the city of New York, in the State of New York, as may be designated by a notice delivered to each of said persons hereinbefore named and signed by not less than three of the said persons hereinbefore named, said first meeting to be held not later than ninety days after the passage of this act. Said first board shall organize by the choice from its number of a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, and they shall require from said treasurer such bonds as may be deemed proper, and may, from time to time, change the amount thereof at their discretion. The secretary shall be sworn to the faithful performance of his duties, and such oath shall be entered upon the records of the company, signed by him, with the oath verified thereon. The president and secretary of said board shall in like manner call all other meetings, naming the time and place thereof. It shall be the duty of said first board of directors to open books, or cause books to be opened, at such time and place as they, or a quorum of them, shall determine, within four months after the passage of this act, to receive subscriptions to the capital stock of said corporation. So soon as 5,000 shares shall in good faith be subscribed for, the said president and secretary of said first board of directors shall appoint a time and place for the first meeting of the subscribers to the stock of said company and shall give notice thereof either personally to each subscriber by mailing to his address, as shown by the books, or in a newspaper published in the city of New York at least ten days previous to the day of meeting. Such subscribers as shall attend the meeting so called, either in person or by lawful proxy, then and there shall elect by ballot nine directors for said corporation, and in such election each share of said capital stock shall entitle the owner thereof to one vote. The president and secretary of said first board of directors, and in case of their absence or inability any two of the officers of said board, shall act as inspectors of said election and shall certify under their hands the names of the directors elected at said meeting. The said first directors, treasurer, and secretary shall then deliver over to said directors all the property, subscription books, and other books in their possession, and thereupon the duties of said first directors and the officers previously appointed by them shall cease and determine forever. Thereafter the stockholders shall constitute said body politic and corporate. Annual meetings of the stockholders of said corporation for the choice of officers and for the transaction of business shall be holden at such time and place and upon such notice as may be prescribed by the by-laws.

SEC. 2. That the right of way through the lands of the United States in the district of Alaska for a standard-gauge railroad, telegraph, and telephone line is hereby granted to the said Alaska Railroad Company from some point on the Gulf of Alaska at or near the head of Cordova Bay, to be determined by said company, to a point on the Yukon River at or within 2 miles of Eagle, by the most eligible route, the same to be built wholly within American territory, to the extent of 100 feet on each side of the center line of its railroad; also the right to take from the lands of the United States adjacent to the lines of said road materials—earth, stone, and timber—necessary for the construction of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone line; also the right to take for railroad uses, subject to the reservation of all minerals and coal therein, public lands adjacent to said right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, water stations, and terminals, and other legitimate railroad purposes, not to exceed in amount 20 acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each 10 miles of its road, excepting at terminals and junction points, which may include an additional 40 acres, to be limited on navigable waters to 80 rods on the shore line, and with the right to use such additional ground as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be necessary where there are heavy cuts and fills: Provided, That at the ocean terminal of said road, on the Gulf of Alaska, on the Pacific, said terminal lands hereby granted shall include 160 acres of uplands, limited to 160 rods on the shore line, and also the mud flats or tidelands in front thereof: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to give to such railroad company, its lessees, grantees, or assigns, the ownership or use of minerals, including coal, within the limits of its right of way or of the lands hereby granted: And provided further, That all mining operations transacted or undertaken within the limits of such right of way or of the lands hereby granted shall, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be so conducted as not to injure or interfere with the property or operation of said railroad over its said lands and right of way. And when said railroad shall connect with any navigable stream or tidewater, such company shall have power to construct, maintain, and operate such piers, wharves, docks, bunkers, and terminals as may be necessary and convenient for connection with water transportation, and for that purpose may take, possess, and use the shores in front of said terminals and extend said piers, wharves, shores in front of said terminals and extend said piers, wharves, docks, bunkers, and terminals to deep water, subject to the approval and supervision of the Secretary of War. That all charges for the transportation of freight and passengers on said railroad shall be just, fair, and reasonable, and shall be subject to all the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all other acts amendatory or supplemental thereof.

SEC. 3. That said company, where its right of way, or where its tracks upon such right of way, pass through any canyon, pass, or defile, shall not prevent any other railroad company from the use and occupancy of said canyon, pass, or defile for the purposes of its railroad or the crossings of its roads at grade, upon such terms and compensation as are just, and the location of its right of way through any canyon, pass, or defile shall not cause the disuse of any tramway, wagon road, or other public highway now located therein, nor prevent the location through the same of any such tramway, wagon road, or highway, provided the same shall not be so located or constructed as to impair the use of such railroad, telegraph, and telephone. And where any change in the location of such tramway, wagon road, or highway is necessary to permit the passage of such railroad through any canyon, pass, or defile, the said company shall, before entering upon the ground occupied by such tramway, wagon road, or highway for construction purposes, cause the same to be reconstructed at its own expense, in the most favorable location and in as perfect a manner as the original road or tramway: Provided, That such expenses shall be equitably divided between said company and any other railroad companies that may now or hereafter keep and use the same canyon, pass, or defile, and that where the space is so limited that it is necessary for said railroads to occupy and use the same tracks or roadbed, if the said companies can not agree upon terms and compensation for such use, the same shall be determined by the United States district court for Alaska having jurisdiction over such place. And nothing herein shall deprive Congress of the right to regulate the charges for freight, passengers, wharfage, or telegraph and telephone tolls, either directly or otherwise, as provided by law.

SEC. 4. That where said company shall, in the construction of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone lines, find it necessary to pass over private lines and possessory claims on lands of the United States, in case it can not agree with the owners or claimants for right of way, it may condemn the same in accordance with section 3 of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864.

SEC. 5. That said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior, within one year after the passage of this act, a preliminary plat of its proposed route, and it shall within one year thereafter file the map of definite location provided for in this act; and said preliminary plat shall, from the time of filing the same, have the effect to render all the lands upon which said preliminary plat and route shall pass subject to said right of way.

SEC. 6. That said company shall within one year from the date of filing said preliminary plat of location of its road, as hereinbefore prescribed, whether upon surveyed or unsurveyed lands, file with the register of the land office for the district where such land is located a map and profile of at least a 20-mile section of its road as definitely fixed, and shall thereafter each year definitely locate and file a map and profile of such location as aforesaid, but not less than 20 miles additional of its line of road, until the entire road has been thus definitely located, and upon the approval thereof by the Secretary of the Interior the same shall be noted upon the records of said office, and thereafter all such lands over which such right of way shall pass shall be disposed of subject to such right of way: Provided, That if any 20-mile section of said road shall not be completed within one year after the approval of said map of definite location by the Secretary of the Interior, or if the map of definite location shall not be filed within one year, as herein required, or if the entire road shall not be completed within eight years from the filing of the said preliminary plat of location, the rights herein granted may be forfeited as to any uncompleted portion of said railroad by Congress: And provided further, That if said Alaska Railroad Company shall not complete and put in operation at least 20 miles of its said railroad within three years from the passage of this act, all the lands granted by this act shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 7. That said Alaska Railroad shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all the necessary draws, culverts, bridges, viaducts, crossings, turn-outs, stations, and watering places, and all other appurtenances, including furniture and rolling stock, equal in all respects to railroads of the first class when prepared for business, with rails of the best quality, and there shall be constructed a telegraph and telephone line of the most substantial and improved description to be operated along the entire line: Provided, That the said company shall not charge the Government of the United States higher rates than they do individuals for like transportation and telegraph and telephone service. And it shall be the duty of the said Alaska Railroad Company to permit any other railroad which shall be authorized to be built in Alaska to form running and track connections with it on fair and equitable terms.

SEC. 8. That the provisions of this act, except the limit of time for completing the main line, shall extend to such branch lines of railroad as said company may desire to construct, maintain, and operate, within eight years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 9. That the company shall have the power to borrow money and secure the same by mortgage or otherwise.

SEC. 10. That, in addition to the terminal lands hereinbefore granted for railroad purposes, there be, and is hereby, granted to said Alaska Railroad Company 2,560 acres of the public lands nonmineral in character, to be selected by said company by legal subdivisions, together with the mud flats or tidelands in front thereof at its terminus at or near the head of Cordova Bay, for which said 2,560 acres of public lands said company shall pay to the United States $2.50 per acre. Said Alaska Railroad Company shall pay the cost of surveying the same as now provided by law in Alaska. Said company shall have the right to select lands claimed or occupied, provided it shall obtain from the claimant or occupant an assignment or relinquishment of his rights, if such lands were claimed or occupied prior to the passage of this act, which assignment or relinquishment in writing shall be filed with the survey and selection of such lands in the office of the register of the United States land office in the district where such lands are situate. Said company shall have the right to improve the said mud flats or tidelands hereby granted for purposes of trade, commerce, and manufacture, in accordance with plans submitted to, and approved by, the Secretary of War: Provided, That ample streets and ways of access to the water front and the harbor area hereinafter provided for shall be reserved to the public by said plans and improvements: Provided further, That the public shall have the right to use all wharves, docks, slips, and waterways erected upon the said harbor area, in front of the lands granted by this section, upon payment of reasonable charges therefor: Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, cause a harbor area to be established along the water front in front of the lands granted by this section at said terminus, at or near the head of Cordova Bay, not exceeding 800 feet in width, which said harbor area shall be reserved in perpetuity for the public, and beyond the outer line of which it shall be unlawful to erect any pier, wharf, dock, or other structure, and said harbor area is hereby reserved from the mud flats or tidelands in this section granted: Provided further, That suitable reservations shall be made for public buildings, schools, and parks when said lands are platted, to be approved by the Secretary of War: And provided further, That any other railroad company that may desire to make its terminus at Cordova Bay shall have the right to condemn for rights of way and terminal purposes, in the manner provided by law, any of the lands granted by this section and not reserved as a harbor area. Said Alaska Railroad Company is hereby given the right to confine the waters of Cordova Creek to one channel, and to straighten and deepen the same.

SEC. 11. That there be, and is hereby, granted to said Alaska Railroad Company one section of coal lands in Alaska, to be selected by said company, for which coal lands said company shall pay to the United States $10 per acre. If the lands selected are claimed or occupied, they may, nevertheless, be entered by said company, provided said company shall procure and file in the local land office, when such entry is made, an assignment or relinquishment by the claimant or occupant.

SEC. 12. That said Alaska Railroad and any and all branches it may construct, or any part thereof, shall be a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and all other Government service, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charges for such Government transportation: Provided, That said company shall be exempt from license or other tax during the construction of the road.

SEC. 13. That the directors of said company shall make to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor an annual report of their receipts and expenditures, verified by the affidavits of the president and at least five of the directors.

SEC. 14. That the directors chosen by the stockholders in pursuance of the first section of this act shall, so soon as may be after their election, elect from their own number a president and vice-president, and said board of directors shall, from time to time and so soon as may be after their election, choose a treasurer and secretary, who shall hold their offices at the will and pleasure of the board of directors. The treasurer and secretary shall give such bonds with such security as the board may from time to time require. The secretary shall, before entering upon his duties, be sworn to the faithful discharge thereof, and said oath shall be made a matter of record upon the books of the corporation. No person shall be a director of said company unless he shall be a stockholder and qualified to vote for directors at the election at which he shall be chosen.

SEC. 15. That the president, vice-president, and directors shall hold their offices for the period indicated in the by-laws of said company, not exceeding three years, respectively, and until others are chosen in their place and qualify. In case it shall so happen that an election of directors shall not be made on any day appointed by the by-laws of said company, the corporation shall not for that reason be deemed to be dissolved, but such election may be held on any day within three months thereafter, which shall be appointed by the directors. The directors, of whom five, including the president, shall be a quorum for the transaction of business, shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, the transfer of shares, the duties and conduct of their officers and servants touching the election and meeting of the directors, and all matters whatsoever which may appertain to the concerns of said company. And the said board of directors may have full power to fill any vacancy or vacancies that may occur from any cause or causes from time to time in their said board; and the said board of directors shall have power to appoint such engineers, agents, and subordinates as may from time to time be necessary to carry into effect the objects of the company, and to do all acts and things touching the location and construction of said road.

SEC. 16. That it shall be lawful for the directors of said company to receive payment in cash, or in property at its cash value, upon all subscriptions received of all subscribers at such times and in such proportions and on such conditions as they shall deem to be necessary to completely carry out the objects of this act. Sixty days' previous notice shall be given of the payments required and of the time and place of payment by publishing a notice once a week in one daily newspaper in the city of New York, and by mailing a notice thereof to each subscriber from whom such payment is due, addressed to him at the address given upon the books of the company. And in case any stockholder shall neglect or refuse to pay, in pursuance of such notice, the stock held by such person may be sold at public auction to the highest bidder, and the company may bid therefor to the amount due it upon such subscription, subject to the condition that the board of directors may allow any stockholder to redeem his stock when so sold on such terms as they may prescribe.

SEC. 17. That the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard to the rights of the said Alaska Railroad Company, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over without prejudice.

Mr. BURNHAM. Retaining its place on the Calendar?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Retaining its place on the Calendar.

CORPS OF DENTAL SURGEONS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. PETTUS. I renew my request for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2355) to organize the corps of dental surgeons, attached to the Medical Department of the Army.

Mr. LODGE. That is the Army dental bill, as I understand. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has been obliged to leave the Chamber. He asked me to say that he was opposed to the bill, and that he did not wish it to be considered in his absence. He requested me to state that, and I told him that I knew in his absence the bill would not be pressed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PLATTSMOUTH, NEBR.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2350) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Plattsmouth, Nebr., and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "forty;" on page 2, line 1, before the word "feet," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty;" and in line 2, after the word "alleys," to strike out "and that no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to said site shall be vested in the United States, and the State of Nebraska shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site and to cause to be erected at the city of Plattsmouth, in the State of Nebraska, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices in said city, with fireproof vaults extending to each story, the site and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $40,000: Provided, That there shall be an open space of not less than 40 feet upon every side of said building, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at the city of Plattsmouth, Nebr."

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC PROPERTY IN HAWAII.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5513) to provide for the disposition of certain property in the Territory of Hawaii.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that all personal and movable property ceded and transferred to the United States by the Republic of Hawaii under the joint resolution of annexation approved July 7, 1898, may be sold, leased, or otherwise disposed of in such manner as may be provided by the laws of the Territory of Hawaii; but that all sales, leases, or other disposals of such property heretofore made by said Territory, under the authority of such laws, are hereby ratified and confirmed, and all moneys or revenues derived from sales or disposals heretofore made, or made under authority of this act, shall remain the property of said Territory.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. POTTER.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3574) for the relief of John H. Potter.

Mr. KEAN. That is a very meritorious bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John H. Potter, formerly master of the collier Saturn, $1,344, in full settlement of salary and traveling and subsistence expenses from the time of his discharge in Manila, August 31, 1901, to the time of his reporting at the Navy Department at Washington, October 25, 1901, and to reimburse him for certain sums expended by order and under authority of commanding officers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARCHÆOLOGICAL INSTITUTE OF AMERICA.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5131) incorporating the Archæological Institute of America.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the fourth section of the bill is surplusage. As I understand the situation, the Smithsonian Institution is already engaged in doing the work referred to in that section. At any rate, the Secretary of the Interior can make the request, and it will be respected by this association. I move that the fourth section be stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Iowa to strike out the last section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior may call upon said corporation to report upon the nature and the desirability of preserving any ancient remains of constructions or other works by former American races found on the public lands; but no expense incurred by the corporation for the purposes of preparing any such report shall be chargeable to or reimbursed by the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CABLE FROM KEY WEST TO GUANTANAMO AND CANAL ZONE.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5448) to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of a telegraphic cable from Key West, Fla., to the United States naval station at Guantanamo, Cuba, and from thence to the Canal Zone, on the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FORAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. CULLOM. I was about to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion.

Mr. KEAN. There are a few small bills which Senators would like to have passed.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well; I will withhold the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. On page 1, line 4, after the word "operate," I move to amend by inserting "for governmental and commercial purposes."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 4, after the word "operate," it is proposed to insert "for governmental and commercial purposes;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to construct, and thereafter maintain and operate, for governmental and commercial purposes, a submarine cable from Key West, Fla., to the United States naval station at Guantanamo, Cuba, and from thence to the Canal Zone, on the Isthmus of Panama; and for the purpose of carrying the foregoing provisions of this act into execution the sum of $927,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated: Provided, That in connection with the installation and operation of such cable system the Secretary of War is authorized and empowered to utilize, if consistent with the public interest, the personnel and resources of the military establishment, as far as they can be advantageously used without detriment to the public interest, and to employ such experts and other persons as may be deemed necessary to assist in carrying into execution the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMSHIP LINDESFARNE.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3581) providing for the payment to the New York Marine Repair Company, of Brooklyn, N. Y., of the cost of the repairs to the steamship Lindesfarne, necessitated by injuries received from being fouled by the United States Army transport Crook in May, 1900.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the New York Marine Repair Company, of Brooklyn, N. Y., $850.13 in full for the cost of the repairs made by that company upon the steamship Lindesfarne, necessitated by the damages done to that vessel by the United States Army transport Crook in collision in May, 1900.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. PAUL, MINNEAPOLIS AND MANITOBA RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10480) for the relief of certain settlers upon land within the indemnity limits of the present St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MICHIGAN STATE CLAIM.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3436) to provide for the settlement of a claim of the United States against the State of Michigan for moneys held by said State as trustee for the United States in connection with the St. Marys Falls Ship Canal.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that upon the payment by the State of Michigan of $68,927.12 into the Treasury of the United States, the Attorney-General is authorized to settle and dismiss from the Supreme Court of the United States a suit in equity now pending therein in which the United States is complainant and the State of Michigan is defendant, and to relinquish all further claims against that State, including interest upon the amount, which have arisen by reason of its trust in constructing and operating St. Marys Falls Ship Canal and locks.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAND CANYON FOREST RESERVE.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2732) for the protection of wild animals in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the first clause of the bill be read again. I want to know the area covered by it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to designate such areas in the Grand Canyon Forest Reserve as should, in his opinion, be set aside for the protection of game animals and be recognized as a breeding place therefor.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no limit to the area, and I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill will lie over.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have it retain its place on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will retain its place on the Calendar.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN KANSAS.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4641) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Kansas.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of Kansas, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable site to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT COURTS OF APPEALS.

Mr. BACON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12843) to amend the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments. The amendments will be stated.

Mr. KEAN. What is the scope of the bill?

Mr. BACON. I will state that it is a bill which simply regulates the question of practice in carrying up appeals where there has been an injunction or the appointment of a receiver from the circuit court to the circuit court of appeals. It comes with the unanimous recommendation of the Judiciary Committee. I can explain it still further if the Senator desires.

Mr. SPOONER. I had forgotten the bill. I should like to ask in what respect it changes the existing law.

Mr. BACON. I have the law before me. Under the present law that proceeding can be had in all cases except where a constitutional question is involved. In other words, in all cases where a constitutional question is not involved an interlocutory order or decree of a circuit court appointing a receiver or granting an injunction can be carried immediately to the circuit court of appeals. Under the present law, however, that is limited to cases which can now go to the circuit court of appeals from the circuit court. The effect of that limitation is that, under the law as it now exists, a case which involves a constitutional question upon a final decree or any other stage of the proceeding, can not go from the circuit court to the circuit court of appeals, but must go to the Supreme Court. There is no rule by which any kind of a case can go from a circuit court to the Supreme Court upon an appeal on an interlocutory decree. The consequence is that wherever a case involves, or is alleged by the pleader to involve, a constitutional question, there is no possibility of any review of an interlocutory decree. It can not go to the circuit court of appeals, because the present law does not permit it to go there. It can not go to the Supreme Court of the United States, because under no circumstances does an interlocutory decree go by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The effect of it is that whenever there is an application for the appointment of a receiver, if the complainant does not desire that the action of the circuit court shall be reviewed in that matter, all he has to do is to allege some constitutional ground, whether it is true in fact or not, and a mere allegation of it operates to prevent any review of the interlocutory order or decree. It is a fact which is stated by the judges of the courts that that is frequently taken advantage of by pleaders for the purpose of preventing the review of the decision of a court appointing a receiver or granting an injunction by an interlocutory decree.

The only effect, I will state to Senators—let any Senator turn to the act of 1900, which is found in the volume of the Statutes at Large for 1900, page 660, in which this seventh section is set out—the only effect of the bill is to take out from it the words which I will read. It is an exact reenactment of the law as it now stands, except that it takes out the words which I now read, which are found on the page I have indicated:

Mr. HEYBURN. On what page?

Mr. BACON. On page 660. The effect of the bill is to strike out these words:

In a cause in which an appeal from a final decree may be taken under the provisions of this act to the circuit court of appeals.

The only effect of it is to make it the law in any case and not limit it as it is limited in that act.

I will state to the Senate that the demand for this enactment does not originate with me. It comes in a very general way from a great many lawyers in many States. I will state further that this is a duplicate of a bill which I introduced in the Senate, and I only bring up the House bill because it has already passed the House and it is better to do that than to pass the Senate bill. This identical bill in form was introduced by me. It was sent to me by Judge Pardee, of the fifth circuit, in a communication in which the matters I have stated are set out by him as a practical evil in the administration of justice.

I have letters from lawyers in which they state the peculiar provision in the law as it now stands, under which there can be no appeal from an interlocutory decree where there is an allegation of a constitutional right, either to the circuit court or to the Supreme Court, and that that peculiarity of the law is frequently taken advantage of and defeats really the ends of justice.

In 1900—in fact, prior to that time, but also in 1900—Congress passed a law which did not previously exist, which was not in the original circuit court of appeals act, under which appeals could be taken from a circuit court to the circuit court of appeals upon the appointment of a receiver or the granting of an injunction by an interlocutory decree. That established the policy which is now the law, and the sole effect of this bill is to make it generally applicable and not leave the particular exception which I have indicated.

The matter has been before the Judiciary Committee, and the bill comes before the Senate with the unanimous recommendation of that committee for its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary were, on page 1, line 7, after the words "eighteen hundred and ninety-one," to insert "as amended by act approved June 6, 1900;" and on page 2, line 2, after the word "or," where it first appears, to insert the words "in a;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the seventh section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, as amended by act approved June 6, 1900, be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That where, upon a hearing in equity in a district or in a circuit court, or by a judge thereof in vacation, an injunction shall be granted or continued, or a receiver appointed by an interlocutory order or decree, in any cause an appeal may be taken from such interlocutory order or decree granting or continuing such injunction, or appointing such receiver, to the circuit court of appeals: Provided, That the appeal must be taken within thirty days from entry of such order or decree, and it shall take precedence in the appellate court; and the proceedings in other respects in the court below shall not be stayed unless otherwise ordered by that court, or by the appellate court, or a judge thereof, during the pendency of such appeal: Provided further, That the court below may, in its discretion, require as a condition of the appeal an additional bond."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. As I understand the bill, this appeal does not stay the proceeding——

Mr. BACON. By no means; it leaves the law just as it is.

Mr. SPOONER. Unless the courts so decide.

Mr. BACON. It does not in any manner affect the law except in the enlargement of the jurisdiction, so as to make it include the case of a decree where there is a constitutional question involved.

I will say further to the Senate that the bill does not in any manner change the present law which will bring to the Supreme Court for adjudication any case which involves on final decree a constitutional question. It is limited simply to the interlocutory proceeding.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is, of course, a question of importance in the practice. Do I understand the Senator to interpret this amendment as merely enlarging the present scope of appeals to be taken, and in section 7 of the act as it now stands eliminating the restriction to the class of cases in which an appeal from a decree may be taken under the provisions of the act?

Mr. BACON. Yes; and the only restriction is the one which I have indicated.

Mr. HEYBURN. It makes the right more general.

Mr. BACON. Simply to that extent, and nothing more.

Mr. HEYBURN. It makes it extend to all cases, then.

Mr. BACON. Yes; by interlocutory decree. The Senator says "extend to all cases." There is but one class of cases added, because there is only one now excluded.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that. It does not interfere with the existing right of appeal direct to the Supreme Court?

Mr. BACON. In other words, it does not change that at all.

Mr. SPOONER. When was the law passed providing for the appeal of an interlocutory order——

Mr. BACON. Some time about 1896 or 1897.

Mr. SPOONER. For appointing a receiver?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir. Then the act was amended in 1900.

Mr. SPOONER. I remember that.

Mr. BACON. That is the act of which I speak.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend the seventh section of the act entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, and the several acts amendatory thereto."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT RENO, NEV.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. I have been up two or three times to move an executive session, but the Senator from Idaho appeals to me in behalf of a little bill and I will yield once more.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4427) to increase the limit of cost of the public building at Reno, Nev.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to increase the limit of the cost of the public building to be erected at Reno, Nev., from $60,000 to $97,500.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 9, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

TREATY WITH SANTO DOMINGO.

The injunction of secrecy was removed April 6, 1906, from a report and resolutions of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation approving the pending treaty with Santo Domingo. (Ex. V, 58th Cong., 3d sess.)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, April 6, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHRISTOPHER C. HARLAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House from the Speaker's table the following House bill with Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 15151) granting a pension to Christopher C. Harlan.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were concurred in.

JOSEPHINE ROGERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following House bill with a Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 8891) granting an increase of pension to Josephine Rogers.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was concurred in.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16953—the Post-Office appropriation bill—Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has the floor for one hour.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the railroads of this country have an inspection of watches. I do not know whether the law requires it or not, but every great railroad company has inaugurated a system of watch inspection and railroad men are required to carry the better grades of watch movements; for that reason the better grades of watch movements are called "railroad movements." This is a wise provision. The men who are responsible for the running of our trains ought to be required to carry watches that will keep the time correctly. Now, if a railroad man wants to buy the best grade of watch movement, if he wants to render the very best service he can to his employer and to the public he will feel like buying a Riverside Maximus movement. He will have considerable trouble, perhaps, in finding a place where he can buy a Riverside Maximus movement for the minimum price at which retailers are permitted to sell them. Even the minimum price, $60, is a large price for the average railroad man to pay. He can not find in his vicinity a small dealer who is able to carry in stock that kind of a movement, and in order to supply himself with it he must apply to the more important retail establishments, to the establishments located in the fashionable shopping districts of our cities where they have a profusion of decorative wares, where they have clerks who manicure their finger nails and wear eyeglasses and part their hair in the middle, and it costs money to run that kind of a place. He will have difficulty in buying a Riverside Maximus movement for less than $75, because they do not sell in those places as cheaply even as the trust permits them to sell. And if he buys a Riverside Maximus movement for $75, after assisting in paying a dividend to the trust upon all their watered stock, he is compelled to work, if he can save out of his wages a dollar a day (and he is likely to save nearer 50 cents a day than a dollar a day)—but assuming that he can save out of his wages a dollar a day, and that is an extravagant figure, he will be compelled to work for the watch trust for thirty days before he can buy this watch at the same price the laboring man over in Europe, 3,000 miles away, is able to buy it for. But he will have to work two or three weeks for the trust before he can buy this movement for the minimum price, $60, and if he wants to buy the very cheapest movement the railroad company will probably permit him to carry—if he wants to buy a Riverside lever-setting Waltham watch, he must work at least two weeks for the watch trust after assisting in paying dividends on millions of watered stock. The laboring man in Europe, or in Canada, just across the St. Lawrence River, is able to get it without this extra effort, thanks to the beneficent effects of our protective tariff.

I have in my possession some of the export catalogues issued by the American watch trust—by the Keystone company and by the Waltham company and the rest of them. Some of them are printed in Spanish; all of them call these watches by other names than the names they are known by here in the United States. None of them quote discounts. Therefore, in an examination of this question their export catalogues are of no service. So I have brought here the watches themselves—the identical watches sold in Europe for a small fraction of the price they are sold for here to retail dealers in this country. Every watch movement is numbered—every one of them. It is easy to identify them. Every movement has stamped upon it the name of the maker. It is easy to identify them as American-made goods.

I have here a movement made by the Waltham Watch Company. This movement is known as a 16-size, 17-jewel Riverside. This identical movement was bought by a Manchester, England, watch dealer from the London office of the Waltham company for 50 shillings net, or a trifle over $12 in American gold. This is one of the grades included in the contract the Waltham company requires dealers to execute; and before they can sell any Waltham movements they must agree to sell this movement to the consumer for $25 or more. They can not sell for less; if they do, they forfeit their entire stock of watches. If they do, the watch trust steps in and closes up their business by shutting off their supplies; and there are dozens and dozens of retail dealers who have met with that sort of treatment from the watch trust in this country. This movement the ordinary retailer sells for about $30. Mr. Keene advertises it for sale there at $16.39; and no retail dealer in this country can buy it for less than $17.35 with all discounts off.

Now, I want to give these gentlemen—the majority on the Ways and Means Committee—the number of this watch; and for their convenience I propose to put it in the RECORD. It is numbered 10537464. I challenge the Waltham company, and I do it deliberately and advisedly and with malice aforethought—I challenge the Waltham company to show by their books (and they can) whether what I have said about this movement is not the exact truth. They have opposite its number, in their books, the history of this identical watch; and I challenge them to show by their books that this watch was not sold abroad—this identical movement—for the price I say it was sold for. I challenge them to say, and to prove by their books, that Mr. Keene is not selling now this identical movement cheaper than any retail dealer in the United States can buy it. If you do not believe what I have said about it, go and inquire of any watch dealer who handles this class of goods.

I have here another Waltham movement. I want to hurry over this part of my speech. I simply want to get these into the RECORD. It is numbered 10087181. This movement is a 16 size, 17-jewel Royal Waltham. It was bought by a Manchester, England, dealer from the London office of the Waltham Watch Company for 30s. net—a trifle over $7 in American gold. This same grade of movement costs the largest retail dealer in America, with all discounts off, $11.60; and Mr. Keene sells it for $10.98—cheaper than any retail dealer can buy it from the watch trust.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. RAINEY. For a question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois why he keeps on speaking of the American watch trust. I am a stockholder of the Waltham Watch Company, and know nothing of any connection with any trust.

Mr. RAINEY. The Ways and Means Committee can give the gentleman a chance to testify on that question.

I have here an 0 size, 16-jewel Lady Waltham, the smallest watch made for the ordinary trade. It is numbered 12016826. This identical movement was bought from the London office of the Waltham Company. I do not know what was paid for it there, but the London dealer sold it next day for 32 shillings to the agent of Mr. Keene, and was satisfied with his profit. He therefore paid considerably less than $8 for it. This same grade of movement, with all discounts off, costs the retail dealer in this country $10.58, and he can not buy it for any less, and Mr. Keene sells it for $10.98.

I have here another movement which was sold abroad by the Waltham Company. This is a 16 size, 15-jewel movement, made by the Elgin National Watch Company, of Elgin, Ill. It is contained in a twenty-year Keystone James Boss brand case, made by the Keystone Watch Case Company, of Philadelphia, Pa. It sold in South America, this identical watch, for $8.40, complete. All the Elgin movements are shipped abroad in Keystone cases; and they only go abroad in Keystone cases, and this case and the movement together was sold in South America for $8.40. The largest retail dealer pays $11.42 with all discounts off. This identical movement paid its way to South America, paid a commission there to a jobber, paid a commission there to a retailer, paid its way back to New York, and you can buy it in this store at 180 Broadway for $9.78.

The movement in the watch that I now hold in my hand is numbered 7877492; it is a 16-size, 7-jewel Elgin watch, made by the Elgin Watch Company. It is in a silveroid case. The case is made by the Keystone Watch Case Company. This watch complete, movement and case, is sold to the South American trade by the Keystone Watch Case Company for $3.04 net. The largest retail dealer in the United States pays $4.79 for it, and Mr. Keene, after it has paid profits to two or three men, after it has paid its way to South America and back, sells it for $4.48, and then makes a profit on it that is entirely satisfactory to him.

The movement in this watch which I now present is numbered 10925821. It is an 0-size, 7-jewel Elgin watch, the smallest watch made by the Elgin company for the ordinary trade. This watch is in a five-year gold-filled Keystone case. This identical movement and this identical case were sold abroad to a London dealer for $4.60 in American gold. The American retailer pays $6.60 for this same grade of watch, and Mr. Keene sells it for $6.28, cheaper than any American retail dealer can buy it. In quoting the prices American dealers are compelled to pay for all these complete watches and movements, I have quoted the price with all discounts off.

Now, I know these facts are not particularly interesting, but I am putting them in the RECORD to give gentlemen on the other side an opportunity to determine whether it is time or not to investigate this sort of thing, and whether these tariff schedules ought not now to be revised.

But we are told since last night, the information has come to us now, that there is to be a revision of the tariff.

You will all be glad to know it and the country will be glad to know it. This morning in the Washington Post is an extract from a letter written by the Speaker of the House to Col. John N. Taylor, of the Knowles, Taylor & Knowles Pottery Company, at East Liverpool, Ohio, and he announces this as the policy now of the Republican party. And if his letter is quoted correctly I am reading it correctly now:

> I am satisfied there will be no tariff revision this Congress, but it goes without saying that the desire for a change which exists in the common mind will drive the Republican party, if continued in power, to a tariff revision. I do not want it, but it will come in the not distant future.

I believe the Speaker of this House told the exact truth about it.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RAINEY. With pleasure.

Mr. SULZER. How in the world will it come if the Speaker does not want it, according to our rules?

Mr. RAINEY. It will come in the not distant future, because the Speaker has begun to understand that the political complexion of this House is going to change. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And that when it does change, there will be enough Democrats here to see that there is a tariff revision. There is no other way of accounting for this kind of a letter at this time.

Now, I want to refer to a little controversy, and anybody can verify what I say by examining the records of the custom-house in New York for the last week. Last week there arrived in New York a consignment of 2,400 American-made watches, shipped from abroad by Mr. Keene's agents there to him—American-made goods every one of them. When they reached the custom-house in New York, they were met by the agents of the watch trust; and I use the term advisedly, in spite of the fact that we have a plutocrat in this House who, by his own admission, is the holder of large blocks of stock in that trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They met this consignment of watches there and protested against the landing of the watches, and with their protest filed affidavits, and they made this showing: They said nearly 1,200 of those 2,400 watches had been advanced in value and improved upon while abroad by the addition of Swiss dials; and when Mr. Keene's agents investigated that statement they found that the watch trust, in order to stop his business, had duplicated a dial in Switzerland exactly the same color as the dials made in this country, exactly similar in all respects, but the words "Made in Switzerland" were stamped on the back of each one of them, and you could not find it out without removing the dials from the movements.

But there it was, a dial worth 4 or 5 cents added to the American movement in order that the American watch trust would be able to say that these identical movements had been "improved upon or advanced in value while abroad," and although less than half of this shipment had been improved in that way the officers in the custom-house at New York held up the entire shipment—the watches that remained unchanged together with the watches that had been improved upon or advanced in value by the addition of the aforesaid dials.

Mr. Keene appealed from the decision of the collector of the port of New York, and came down here, and on Friday of last week I accompanied him to the Department of Justice and to the officials of the Treasury Department and laid the matter before them, insisting that Mr. Keene had the right at least to withdraw his 1,287 watches that had not been improved upon or advanced in value, and that had been returned in identically the same condition they were in when they left this country. The officials at the Treasury Department held against us on that proposition. I am not prepared to say that they were not right about it. From their standpoint they were. There was some doubt about the question, and when there is any doubt about a question of this kind it is always resolved by Republican officials against the people and in favor of the trusts. [Applause on Democratic side.] Therefore I do not find any fault with them. They were compelled to do this. On last Saturday he paid the duty on the entire shipment of 2,400 watches, shipped the watches back to England, and took a rebate of 99 per cent of the amount of the duty paid. I could find nothing else for him to do. He gave his bond, agreeing to surrender to the customs officials his landing certificate when he gets it back from the consul at London, and thus release the bond.

He proposes now, these watches having been all shipped in the same consular invoice, to overcome this objection of the officials raised under the Dingley law and to remove from this consignment these watch movements that have not been changed in any way and to ship them back under a separate consular invoice, and then there can be no question so far as they are concerned. He proposes then to remove the Swiss dials from the other movements and ship these American-made movements back to this country in identically the same condition they were in when they went abroad. There are 1,123 of them, I believe. The watch trust has, in effect, served upon him this notice: When these 1,123 watches come back, we will meet you again at the custom-house. They have been here once before, and it may be true that they are in the same condition they were in when they first went abroad, but they have been here before, and here are the numbers on this liquidated consular invoice, and it has been held once that they are dutiable. We insist that that is res adjudicata, and you have got to pay the duty on them to get them. Upon that issue Mr. Keene's attorneys in New York City propose to make a fight, and that fight will be pending, if the watch trust makes good its threat, at the time the Congressional elections are on this fall, and you will have something else to answer for then.

Now, I understand, if anybody replies to this speech—and some of you had better reply to it—whoever replies will advance this sort of an argument: "The Dingley tariff raises the wages of employees. It makes it possible to employ more men. It makes it possible for the business to enlarge and to increase in importance." Why, in 1880 there were twenty-seven watch factories in the United States. Now there are only thirteen.

Since 1880 the number of employees in the watch factories has increased, it is true; they employ now in the watch business—the business of manufacturing movements in this country—15 per cent more men than they employed in 1880; but they employ 600 per cent more women and 200 per cent more children. A tariff which produces this sort of result, which endangers the future of the race in this way, ought certainly to be investigated. It does not exist for the purpose of enabling watch companies to pay more money in wages to individual employees; it operates only to enable them to employ cheaper labor, to pay less money.

Now, nobody can say that these watches to which I have called attention are old-style goods, and that therefore they are shipping them abroad. That is the reason that is usually advanced. It is a great consolation to the old farmer to know that the color scheme on his cultivator has changed since last year, and for that reason he has got an out-of-date cultivator. It is a splendid consolation to him to know that the decoration on his wagon bed has changed. Last year they decorated wagon beds with roses; this year they decorate with lilies of the valley. The kind of wagon he bought last year is out of date, and for that reason they are shipping that kind abroad. If he wants to be up to date, to be a modern farmer, to farm in a scientific manner, he must buy wagons decorated not with roses, but with lilies of the valley. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Chairman, they made watches four hundred years ago.

They made watches so small four hundred years ago that you could put one of them in the end of a lead pencil, and they can not do any better than that now. There has been no change in the style of watches; there has been nothing new in watches for four hundred years. They make them cheaper now, that is all. Over here in the National Museum they have a collection of watches presented to the Museum by Tiffany & Co., of New York, representing the various eras in the watch industry, and the watches made four hundred years ago are not very different from the watches they made last year in this country. These numbers I have given you are among the latest numbers. They are not old style goods. They can not escape responsibility on that ground.

Does the McKinley tariff have the effect of building up the watch industry? Why, certainly not. I have here an article written for the last edition of the Encyclopedia Americana, a signed article, written by E. A. Marsh, general superintendent of the American Waltham Watch Company, and signed by him, and I ask permission to put this in the RECORD. I do not want to read it at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from the article on watches in the Encyclopedia Americana.]

In conclusion, it may be said that notwithstanding the two or more centuries of priority and experience enjoyed by European watchmakers, their extreme conservatism has allowed them to be outstripped by the more progressive manufacturers of America, so that modern watch making is at the present time and in its most advanced form an exclusively American achievement.

E. A. MARSH,
General Superintendent American Waltham Watch Company.

Mr. RAINEY. Credit here is given not to the tariff, not to the men who organized the companies and watered the stock, but to the brains and intelligence and skill of the American workingman, and that is where it belongs. This article should be construed most strongly against the companies on the tariff question.

Mr. Chairman, this little watch to which I last called attention is a watch that is in demand for the holiday trade, and the Elgin company keeps it scarce in the fall in order to keep the price up. Not long ago Mr. Keene bought 2,000 of these watches from the Keystone Watch Case Company in London through an agent, and when they found out the watches were intended for shipment to the United States they refused to deliver, and Mr. Keene and the man who made the purchase for him sued the Keystone Watch Case Company, and I have here the plea they filed to their declaration in the English court. It reads as follows:

In the high court of justice, Kings bench division. 1904 K, No. 549.
Between Charles Alden Keene and Maurice Michael, plaintiffs, and the Keystone Watch Case Company, defendants.

DEFENSE AND COUNTER CLAIM—DEFENSE.

1. The defendants admit paragraph 2 of the statement of claim.

2. The defendants were induced to enter into the said agreement in writing by the verbal representation of the plaintiff, Maurice Michael, to the defendants made on or about the 21st day of July, 1903, that all the said watches were required for exportation to France only and not to the United States of America, and that he intended to and would export them.

3. The said representation was untrue in fact. The plaintiff, Maurice Michael, then required the said watches solely for exportation to the United States of America, and so imposed and intended to export them.

Now, I am putting in the RECORD the title of this case and the number of the case, and in order that you may further investigate it I want to say that the attorneys who represented Keen & Michael in this suit were the London attorneys of R. G. Dun & Co.—Dommett & Sons, of London, England, and you can write to them if you do not believe I present here a correct copy of this defense.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the gentleman any data showing that watches made in the United States were shipped to Europe and brought back and sold in the manner he has indicated under or during the operation of the tariff acts of 1846 or 1857, or before the civil war?

Mr. RAINEY. No; it never was done. Watches were never shipped abroad and sold for a less price than they were sold in this country until after the Dingley law went into effect. I have here a list of watch dealers in various parts of the world, from Europe, from Africa, and South America, and I charge that to each one of these watch dealers the American watch trust—the Elgin company and the Waltham company and the Keystone company and the rest of them—sell watches for a mere fraction of the price they sell to the American retailer, and I challenge them to show by their books that they do not do so, and I ask permission to put this list in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the statement the gentleman presents will be printed in the RECORD. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The following is the list referred to:

Mr. Evan Roberts, 30 St. Georges square, Regents Park, London; Mr. J. Blanckensee & Co., 48 Frederick street, Birmingham, England; Mr. Marcel Bourdais, 62 Ruede, Tavernue, Paris; Ballantyne & Son, 52 Virginia street, Glasgow, Scotland; MM. Les Fils de Braunschweig, Chaux de Fonde, Switzerland; E. Collins & Co., 34 Pritchard, Johannesburg, Africa; George & Co., Scotland road, Liverpool, England; Hopkins & Hopkins, No. 1 Lower Sackville, Dublin, Ireland; Mr. Hurtis Sendre, 6 Old China Bazaar street, Calcutta, India; Mr. Otto Heerman, 34 Ferdinand Strasse, Hamburg, Germany.

Mr. RAINEY. In 1898 they had a strike in the Elgin works, and I ask permission to put in the RECORD, from the Chicago Tribune, the charges made by the strikers against their employers.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has heard the request of the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection thereto? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article referred to is as follows:

[Extract from page 4, Chicago Tribune, Sunday, August 28, 1898.]

STATEMENT OF GRIEVANCES OF EMPLOYEES.

Whereas the amount of labor required to finish and stem-fit watches is greatly increased by the poor quality and workmanship of the material furnished us; and

Whereas the price of stem fitting and finishing watches under these conditions has been cut to a point where we can not make living wages; and

Whereas we have duly made complaint of these conditions to the foreman of the finishing department and also to the superintendent of the factory, without obtaining any satisfactory consideration; and

Whereas the stem fitters have been replaced by girls, who do the work at greater expense to the company than was demanded by the stem fitters; and

Whereas we know the company has been actuated in the past by kindly feeling for its employees, which has been shown by generous and unsolicited subscriptions to the aid fund for sick and deceased operatives, and also in many other ways: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the president of the company be informed of the present unhappy condition of affairs at the factory, and see if our grievances can not be peaceably adjusted on the common ground of justice and fair dealing.

* * * * * * *

STATEMENT OF ONE OF THE STRIKERS.

"In order to make living wages at the scale offered by the company," one of the strikers said, "we were obliged to work so rapidly that no human being can stand the nervous tension. The most skilled finishers in the United States are unable to assemble more than forty watches a day. On one grade of movement made at Elgin a finisher would be compelled to put 100 watches together every day to make $3—a strain that would send the most phlegmatic finisher in the country to the madhouse inside of a week if it were a physical possibility to assemble that many movements."

DIVIDENDS PAID IN 1893.

In 1893, when many corporations were struggling to keep from insolvency, the Elgin National Watch Company paid four dividends of 4 per cent, though to do it, the dissatisfied men declare, half of the employees were discharged and the wages of the rest were cut from 10 to 50 per cent. None of the cuts in the wage scale, the employees say, has ever been restored. When the Dingley tariff bill was before Congress the Elgin Company is credited with having obtained a special duty on imported watch movements in addition to the ad valorem duty. Senator Mason, who spoke in favor of a duty, said it was a necessity to enable American watchmakers to obtain living wages. The heavy tariff went into effect, and the Elgin Company raised the price of watch movements almost to where they had been before the panic of 1893. The exact advance is not known, as the company's prices to wholesalers are trade secrets. It is known that the wholesale dealers put up the price of Elgin movements all the way from 50 cents for the cheapest to $10 for the best movements. The employees, however, say there was no increase in wages.

Nearly two-thirds of the factory employees are women and girls. In five years improved machinery has been introduced by the Elgin mechanics that is said to be doing the work of over 200 skilled workmen, estimating by the present output of the works. Most of these machines are run by women and girls, who are paid from 60 cents to a dollar and a half a day. A skilled watchmaker acts as foreman for several of these machines. Men are found indispensable for the difficult work of assembling and timing.

Mr. RAINEY. In these charges they make they say that since the Dingley tariff went into effect the Elgin Watch Company has commenced to export their watches, that the Elgin Watch Company employ now cheaper labor, that the Elgin Watch Company employ now cheaper material, and it requires a finisher now to assemble a hundred watches of a certain kind a day in order to make $3 a day, and in order to do that work he must lay off and rest at least two days in each week. Five days after these charges were made the Elgin Company, finding that it would not do to advertise these features of their business, settled with the striking employees, and that strike won.

Now, have I satisfied the gentlemen on the other side? Interruptions are not as frequent now as they were formerly. Have I satisfied the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who had so much to say yesterday about this picture I displayed here on this easel? I displayed the picture here in this room because I had a right to do it under the rules of the House, and because I obtained authority from the proper source before displaying it here.

The gentleman for so many years and with such signal ability has represented the railroads and the corporations in this body that he can not understand now how a Member can honestly and conscientiously want to represent the people [applause on the Democratic side], and he puts into the RECORD these sneering remarks. The gentleman has been a member of the school of protection graft for so long a time that he can not understand what it means for a man to have an honest motive in a matter of this kind. Have I satisfied the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]? And for him I entertain the highest personal regard. Have I satisfied the majority leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]? I saw him yesterday circulating on that side advising Republicans to ask me no more questions. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Have I satisfied him? Are you all satisfied? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Is the gentleman a mind reader, or did he hear it, or what is he testifying about?

Mr. RAINEY. Why did they quit then; why were you going around talking to them; why did you ask no questions? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do you propose to investigate this watch trust? Do you? The country would be glad to know it. If there is any man in this House now who believes that a tariff that can produce this sort of outrage ought not now to be revised, stand up now, my friend, here and now.

Mr. LACEY rose.

Mr. RAINEY. If there are any more, stand up, every one of you here, so the country can see you. Stand up so we can see you. All the rest of you stand up so your constituents can see you and leave you at home when the time comes to select Members for the Sixtieth Congress.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman calls for questions and then when anyone arises to ask him a question he declines——

Mr. RAINEY. I do not yield for a speech; you can make that in your own time.

Mr. LACEY (continuing). Then the gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAINEY. I yield for a question, nothing else, as I have only five minutes.

Mr. LACEY. We will agree to give you more time. You are doing well and we will give you all the time you want.

Mr. RAINEY. Very well, I will answer your question.

Mr. LACEY. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago, in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, that prior to the increased tariff duty there were no watches sent from the United States abroad; is that correct?

Mr. RAINEY. And sold for less——

Mr. LACEY. Or sold at any price.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. RAINEY. I did not say that.

Mr. LACEY. Is it not true they were not sent abroad at any price, because they were not made here?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then why did you put on the tariff?

Mr. RAINEY. Watches have been made here for a hundred years. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Before that time for two hundred years watch making was a household industry in Switzerland.

Mr. LACEY. Under this law of which the gentleman so bitterly complains is it not true that one of the greatest manufactories in the world has been built up in your own State, and to-day a Swiss conductor on a Swiss railroad takes an Elgin watch, made in Illinois, to tell the traveler what time it is? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. And he pays less for it than the poor farmer of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAINEY. American watches are the best in the world, I believe.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to answer the gentleman from Iowa this way. My question was this: Has the gentleman from Illinois any data showing American watches were shipped to Europe and brought back to the United States under the acts of 1846 or 1857, or before the civil war, and sold cheaper to the people of the United States than they were sold originally in the United States? Now, then, on your question of tariff. Under the Democratic tariff act of 1846 the tariff on watches—gold, silver, etc.—was 10 per cent; under the act of 1857 the tariff was 8 per cent, and the war tariff of 1861 was 15 per cent; in 1862, 1863, and 1864, 20 per cent, and under the act of 1870 it was 25 per cent on watches—gold, silver, etc.

Mr. LACEY. The war tariff of 1862 was 5 per cent——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Wait a minute. Now, if there were no goods sent to Europe, why did you put a tariff on those goods at all?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I understand my time is to be extended, but I do not want to take up too much time even with that understanding. I have waited in vain for some Member on the other side to intimate that there was courage enough there to revise the tariff. You are not the leaders of the Republican party, none of you, from the Speaker down to the youngest Member who sits modestly on the other side of this Hall. The real leaders of the Republican party are the McCurdys and the McCalls and the Hamiltons, the men who furnish you with the sinews of war [applause on the Democratic side]; the Rockefellers, who skulk now behind armed guards in locked castles to evade the serving of the writs issued by our courts. They are the real leaders of the Republican party; you are not. Your cowardice in this matter proves that you are not. Why, you are only the decoys these fellows place out in the pond to lure your friends to destruction. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You dare not act; I challenge you to act; I challenge you, the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means, to investigate any trust in this country; to serve subpœnas upon the officials of these companies to have them produce their books before the Ways and Means Committee. You can do it and find out whether what I have said is not true. You stand behind the majority you received at the last election and feel safe. One million five hundred thousand Democrats stayed at home, and you are under the impression that you are secure.

Majorities count for nothing. Over four hundred years ago an Italian university had on its enrollment 30,000 students and in its faculty 600 professors. The faculty met, and after a stormy debate for six months—there were 600 in this faculty, and it was a bigger school than this Standard Oil college out in Chicago—and they debated for months the question, and then they solemnly decided, and they unanimously decided, that the world was flat and Columbus was a fool; but that did not make it true. A majority of the inhabitants of this globe are polytheists now. Is that any reason why we should yield to the majority and tear down our churches and build Chinese joss houses? A majority is not a safe thing to stand behind, my friends.

Ninety-four years ago the great Napoleon was advancing upon the Russian capital at the head of an army of half a million men, riding in person at the head of crushing squadrons of cavalry, with nodding plumes; in all the history of the world no such magnificent aggregation of armed men had been assembled as this. Cities had thrown open their gates; kingdoms had capitulated. He was apparently soon to become the master of the known world. His power was apparently never greater; he was apparently never more secure; but at that very moment his crushing defeat and banishment to an obscure island in the Mediterranean was less than four years away. So—for many of you, who cowardly sit here to-day and keep your mouths shut, your Waterloo and your relegation to the rear and to the private walks of life is considerably less than four years away. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic party, fortunately, does not have any leaders. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They do not need any leaders. [Renewed laughter.] The brilliant gentleman, my friend from Mississippi, who sometimes for three or four days believes he is leading the small minority of this House, will agree with me in this proposition, and he does as well as anybody could possibly do. The Democratic party never had any leaders, and never will have any leaders, and the Democratic party does not need any leaders. [Laughter.] The man who wants to observe the commandment "Thou shalt not steal" does not need a leader. [Laughter and applause.] Every Democrat is a leader unto himself [laughter], and in its last analysis every Democratic platform and every Democratic campaign means this: "Thou shalt not steal." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We stand upon certain basic principles. We believe in the doctrine—it is never too often asserted and announced—"Equal rights to all, special privileges to none." We have emblazoned that motto in letters of fire upon the clouds, until it becomes a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night; and that is the leadership the Democratic party follows [loud applause], and no man under that kind of a leader will ever go to the penitentiary. [Laughter.] We may differ sometimes on matters of detail and party management, but we follow that leadership, and we are going in the right direction.

You are bought, every one of you, body, soul, boots, and breeches, by the trusts [laughter]; and you dare not assert the principles you really believe in. No man knows how much it costs Rockefeller, the insurance companies, and the rest of those fellows to buy you. Andy Hamilton may tell some of these days, and we will then know how many millions they had to pay for the kind of support you gave these kind of fellows.

Nobody knows except the managers of the insurance companies and their allied organizations and the managers of the Republican campaigns since 1896, and they will not tell—the men who stole the goods, and the men who received the stolen goods. The doors of our penitentiaries are opening now for every one of them. Majorities against it do not injure the Democratic party; the party stands now where it has always stood—at its post of duty. You can not defeat a party that stands for correct basic principles.

Two thousand years ago the ashes and the lava rose from Mount Vesuvius and overwhelmed two fair cities of the plain. On the walls at the gate of one of these cities stood a Roman soldier, his body incased in the iron armor of that period, holding in his hand the chain which held open the gate, and during that long and terrible night of death and despair he stood at his post of duty and held open the gate, and through the open gate thousands of men and women and children escaped to the green fields and the life and the liberty and the happiness which lay beyond.

But the ashes and the lava continued to fall, and blotted from the sight of men the ancient city of Pompeii. A thousand years passed by, and the site of that ancient city was discovered, the ashes and cinders were dug away from her streets, and there, standing on the wall, still holding in his hand the chain that held open the gates a thousand years before—standing at his post of duty—they found the old Roman soldier, his sightless eye sockets uplifted toward the stars. My friends, it does not require a thousand years for us. Already the shifting winds have blown the ashes of three great defeats from our streets, and you find the Democratic party standing where it has always stood, standing at its post of duty, still holding in its hands the chain which holds open the gates through which men, women, and children may yet escape from the dangers of the trusts, from the dangers of the protective tariff and its unrevised schedules, from all these dangers to the green fields and the life, the liberty, and the happiness that lie beyond. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks and to print as an appendix to them an article which recently appeared in the Chicago Public on the subject of watches.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

APPENDIX.

A LESSON IN PROTECTION.

[By ex-Congressman Robert Baker. From The Public (Louis F. Post, editor), Chicago, Ill., February 10, 1906.]

If the American people are not entirely devoid of all sense of humor, then 180 Broadway will soon become as widely known as 26 Broadway. But whereas 26 Broadway, New York, has long been an object of hatred, has embodied the very quintessence of trust wickedness, No. 180, on the same street, should personify the American spirit, the determination of the American citizen to emulate his forefathers and revolt against trust extortion.

The colossal building, 26 Broadway, which houses the numerous subsidiary companies and departments which make up the Standard Oil Company, typifies the ramifications, the strength, and the arrogance of the oil trust. The massive building seems to breathe defiance to the American people. A defiance and a warning. A defiance of all law and all restraint. A warning that whoever dares match his puny strength with that of the trust will be crushed by its remorseless despotism.

Equally does 180 Broadway personify the individual spirit; that spirit that has made America what it is; the spirit of individual determination; the spirit to do and dare; the determination to live and thrive despite the attempt of a trust to annihilate whoever will not submit to its dictation. For much as some are prone to extol bigness, it is not the great aggregations of capital that have put this country to the fore among the nations, but rather individual self-reliance, individual initiative, individual determination to achieve, no matter what the obstacles.

And the greatest evil of the trusts, in my opinion, is not their gigantic robberies, colossal as they are, but the closing up of opportunity to individual effort which inevitably results from the existence of these combinations, with their monopolistic power, to crush competition. And so I say that 180 Broadway personifies the real American spirit.

But you may ask, "In what manner, in what particular, does 180 Broadway typify the American spirit?" If there are any who do not already know it, I would say that 26 Broadway is a gigantic granite building, 14 stories high, 125 feet wide, some 250 feet deep, running through to that haven of stockbrokers, New street, and is used exclusively by the Standard Oil Company. On the other hand, 180 Broadway is a modest 25-foot building. It seems to stand as a protest against the policy of concentration going on all around it, as it is going on all over the United States, under which a constantly smaller number of people are absorbing most of the wealth produced. On the street level there is nothing to distinguish it from a score of other store fronts, as the store window, like most modern stores, is a large pane of plate glass.

But the contrast is striking in another particular. The imposing granite structure which is the home of the greediest and most ruthless of all trusts, the Standard Oil Company, that band of financial pirates dubbed by Lawson as the "system," while impressive in its massiveness, yet lacks the attractive element. One hundred and eighty Broadway, on the other hand, while itself an unimposing building, yet possesses a distinct attractive power. While none but the agents and satellites of the monopoly, and those compelled to do its bidding, ascend the steps at 26 Broadway, hundreds of the city's population eagerly enter the other, while scores of people are ever congregated in front of the store. Why this contrast? it may be asked. The answer is simple. Where 26 Broadway is the home of "addition, division, and silence," and all who enter must swear eternal fealty and secrecy, 180 can only thrive through publicity and open and above-board dealing. The oil trust has fear and necessity for its servants; all who do business with it had better keep mum as to what they learn; but the other building derives its popularity because it is the head center of a contest against monopoly.

Its power to attract lies in the fact that behind that large plate-glass window is spread out the conclusive proof of the falsity of the claim that the "system," miscalled "protection," really benefits the worker, in whose interest it is said to be established.

In that store window is displayed, in case upon case, the indisputable proof that human beings can not be trusted with unrestrained power; that such power will almost certainly be used solely for their own aggrandizement and enrichment, and not for the benefit of those in whose interest it is claimed to be conferred, and for whom those intrusted with the power are supposed to merely act as agents.

That these agents are vociferous in asserting that they ask for the power to tax simply that they may convey the benefit to others does not alter the case. The power to tax being theirs, they use it not to raise wages to employees, but to create fortunes for employers; not to expand production, but to restrict it by extortionate prices.

At 180 Broadway an enterprising American merchant presents the proof that his fellow-citizens are victims of a gigantic flim-flam game, that the people are playing with those who hold loaded dice, the dice being labeled "protection." Because that word implies a spirit of beneficence, those who hold the loaded dice are able to fool the American people into the idea that in some mysterious manner they are its beneficiaries, whereas they are really its victims.

In this store window are displayed hundreds and hundreds of watches (American) which have been exported and sold abroad at such large reductions from the home price that this watch dealer, Charles A. Keene, is able to maintain agents in England, Germany, and other European countries—yes, even in Egypt—to purchase these American watches, express them back to the United States, and, after paying all expenses for commissions, express and insurance charges, is then able to undersell other dealers in the same identical goods, who buy their watches direct from the watch trust, by from 25 to 50 per cent.

Having before their own eyes this convincing evidence of the fraud that is practiced upon them in the contention of the watch trust that a tariff on watches is necessary to prevent them from being driven out of business by foreign watch manufacturers—the very foreigners whom they are underselling in Europe—is it surprising that those who have heard of the fraud should make a pilgrimage to that store to see for themselves, and that there should always be a struggling, pushing crowd eager to examine the proof of this robbery in the name of "protection?"

Nor is it surprising that this enterprising and courageous Yankee (courageous in thus throwing down the gauge of battle to a wealthy trust) should at times find his store inadequate to accommodate those who are so foolish as to desire to obtain an American watch at from 60 to 75 per cent of the price his neighbor has paid for a similar timepiece made in the same factory (i. e., by either the Waltham or Elgin companies, who compose the trust), but which has not made a trip to Europe.

There is no possibility of the purchasers being deceived. Every one of these watches has made the European trip, is numbered and stamped with the name, either Waltham or Elgin. In order, however, that the skeptical, or even the most timid, may be relieved of any possible doubt of the absolute reliability of these watches—as to their being the standard make and that they are not old goods, but that they are of the latest designs—this man, Charles A. Keene, who has thus circumvented the trust, gives to each purchaser a written guaranty that it is in all respects as represented, agreeing to return the purchase price if any dealer to whom the purchaser may submit the watch will say that it is not a genuine Waltham or Elgin of the latest manufacture and of the grade as represented.

It is perhaps too much to expect that, with so many other phases of the trust question engrossing public thought, the name of the American who defies and harasses the watch trust will become a household word, but if posterity is to accord fame in proportion to the effectiveness of the blows each of us may deliver against trust extortions, then the name of Charles A. Keene will surely be associated with the fight against an arrogant monopoly—the watch trust.

Whether "Keene is," as a newspaper has said, "an effective trust buster," or not, certainly he has shown that he is not merely Keene by name, but keen by nature, for in reimporting their own watches and selling them in competition with their own agents at from a quarter to a half less than they are sold for almost next door, he hits the trust a solar plexus blow. Keene is evidently an American who is alive to his opportunities; one who is not deterred from going straight to the mark by any threats of the trust that "they will put him out of business," and "will not permit him to get any watches to sell." Fortunately, he is endowed with that indomitable grit which is characteristic of his race, and he has not been bluffed, cajoled, or frightened. This case is but another illustration of how little one knows in this big city of what his neighbor is doing.

It seems that Mr. Keene has reimported and sold thousands of these watches during the past year, and yet it was only a few days ago that I learned about it; and I find that a similar ignorance of the matter existed among my friends, although some pass the store almost daily, but then a crowd no longer attracts a permanent New Yorker.

Keene distinctly disclaims being a philanthropist. He says he is merely following that immutable law which governs the actions of men, which leads them to gratify their desires with the least exertion.

Having figured out (and subsequently proved) that there was more money to be made by defying the trust than in acceding to its demands, and having the necessary grit, he proceeded to defy it. For the watch trust follows the practice of other monopolistic combinations—it exacts a written pledge from the dealers that they will not sell to customers at less than certain stipulated prices. The pledge is cast iron and copper riveted, and woe betide the dealer who dares break it by selling his watches at less than list prices.

Fourth of July orators tell us that this is a Republic, that freedom reigns, and that we are sovereign citizens. And yet this proves that thousands of watch dealers all over the country are really nothing more than the hired servants of the watch trust. It is true that their names are emblazoned on store windows and over doors. But in order to reveal the condition of servitude that exists—the real relation existing between the watch trust and retailers of watches—their signs should read, not—

"William Jones, watch dealer and jeweler."

But—

"William Jones, employee of the watch trust."

No wonder that when Keene hoists the trust with its own petard that it squirms, fumes, and threatens him with the most dreadful penalties if he does not desist from buying their own goods (abroad) and retailing them at from 30 to 50 per cent less than they permit American retailers to sell them for.

Presumably the trust's wits have been sharpened by Keene, but they have not yet devised a plan to prevent his continuance of what, for his customers at least, is a philanthropic act.

As an illustration: The most expensive watch made by the Waltham Watch Company is the grade known as "Riverside Maximus." The usual price at retail is $75. American dealers have to enter into an ironclad agreement not to sell for less than $60. Keene buys this watch abroad, pays all expenses, commissions, express, and insurance charges, and yet is able to sell it at retail for $42.30 and still make a legitimate profit.

He tells me this holds true as to practically all other grades of watches, about the same proportionate reduction of price being made all through. He is even able to reimport an American Waltham watch and retail it for $2.98.

Surely this is a lesson in protection for the American people.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I also ask permission to print in the RECORD a small cut of this picture which I have used in illustrating my speech, and to furnish the cut at my own expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LACEY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask whether this is a proposition to insert this cut-rate diamond advertisement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. LACEY. I understand it is a proposition to insert this advertisement of cut-rate diamonds in New York City in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. RAINEY. No, sir; to insert the picture that I have used in illustrating my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. To insert the identical picture which is exhibited in front of the desk, only on a smaller scale.

Mr. LACEY. I understand the firm that it advertises will pay for the cut.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether this has ever been permitted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to inform the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I can inform him. It has been done half a dozen times since I have been in Congress.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I shall make no objection, if there ever has been a picture printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD illustrating a Member's remarks; but if this is the first instance of it, I think we ought to prevent the starting of a precedent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It has been done repeatedly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Maps and everything.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I am simply inquiring whether a cut which clearly shows an advertisement of an individual has ever been printed as a part of a gentleman's remarks? I am not questioning the point which the gentleman has made, but nevertheless this is clearly advertisement, and I inquire whether it has ever been done?

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, one question.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask it as a matter of right, then.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Suppose the name is stricken out, and only the words left, "Cheaper than in America."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield for this question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Of whom and what about?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the name of the dealer is stricken out and only the words left "Cheaper than in America;" would you still object?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana did not object. The objection came from another source.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask for the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. RAINEY. I rise to a question of privilege. I insist I have the right to put this picture in the RECORD under the rules of this House at my own expense.

The CHAIRMAN. That is something that will come up later. The Chair does not have to pass upon it now.

Mr. RAINEY. I submit it now. It is time for this speech to go to the printer.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I object.

Mr. RAINEY. I move that I be permitted to print this picture in the RECORD with my speech at my own expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not recognized for that; and, in the second place, the Committee of the Whole has not control of that matter, but the House.

Mr. RAINEY. Then I will submit my motion to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has not the floor. The gentleman from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] does not desire to occupy some time, I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDER].

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, the pending measure is of more interest to the people of this country than any other appropriation bill that will come before this House. I regret exceedingly that, in its consideration of this bill, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads did not see fit to include a provision increasing the salaries of letter carriers to $1,200 per annum. I am advised that at the proper time an amendment to the pending measure will be introduced, fixing the salaries of carriers in all cities where the population exceeds 250,000 people to the amount above indicated. I bespeak for this amendment, when introduced, your very careful consideration.

It will affect the carriers in the post-offices at New York, Chicago, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston, Baltimore, Cleveland, Buffalo, San Francisco, Cincinnati, Pittsburg, New Orleans, Detroit, Milwaukee, and Washington.

I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments so that I may lay before you the reasons why, in my judgment, this amendment when offered should be adopted.

I propose to discuss the proposition from the standpoint of New York and Brooklyn. There during the past ten years rents and living expenses have increased 30 per cent. The employees in the State and municipality have had their salaries increased accordingly. We pay our police officers and firemen $1,400 per annum. Ten years ago they received $1,000. Our inspectors of health, tenements, water, and buildings are all paid from $1,200 to $1,500 per annum. The cleaners and laborers in our public buildings are paid $900 per annum, while the letter carrier, appointed after a most rigid examination and barred by the rules of the Post-Office Department from further promotion, and possessing the highest state of intelligence, receives the maximum salary of $1,000 per annum, or $19 per week. Out of this sum he is compelled to purchase two complete uniforms each year, and is not paid when he is ill. Mr. Chairman, ten years ago in New York City the carpenter was paid $3 per day; now he receives $4.50. The bricklayer, plasterer, and plumber were paid $4 per day; now they receive $5.50 per day; and so I might enumerate all of the trades. The hod carriers to-day receive $3.25 a day, as against $2.50 a day ten years ago. The motormen and conductors on the street railways receive $2.40 per day, which is an increase of 20 per cent. The people employed in our factories and stores are receiving an average of 15 per cent more in salaries than they received ten years ago, while the letter carrier, as regular as the clock, trudges along, in all sorts of weather, not only working six days a week, but compelled to spend three or four hours at the post-office on Sunday preparing his work for the next day, and in the busy seasons, when the mail is heavy, not only works from twelve to sixteen hours a day without complaint, but at Easter, election time, Christmas, and New Year is often compelled to hire a horse and wagon to carry his bulky mail, for which expenditure the Government makes no allowance.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. CALDER. I will.

Mr. SULZER. Does not the gentleman from New York know that I have introduced a bill at the request of the letter carriers of the United States in the last five Congresses to graduate their pay so that they will get enough to live on decently and be able to procure the necessaries of life for themselves and their families; and does not the gentleman know that the Republican Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of this House has refused for five successive Congresses to report this letter-carriers' bill?

Mr. CALDER. I know that the gentleman from New York has introduced a bill in this Congress. I do not know what he has done before, and I do not know the reasons why the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has refused to report the measure.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understood the gentleman to say that the letter carriers labor from twelve to fourteen hours a day?

Mr. CALDER. During certain busy seasons.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to know if there is not a post-office regulation that compels them to suspend their labor after eight hours, even though they may be in the midst of a delivery?

Mr. SULZER. That is not a post-office regulation; it is the law.

Mr. HEPBURN. And they are not under any circumstances allowed to labor more than eight hours?

Mr. CALDER. The statement of the gentleman from Iowa is undoubtedly true, but I know of some instances where letter carriers in Brooklyn work more than eight hours a day through the busy seasons of the year.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that there is no class of men in the Government employ more deserving. They are compelled because of the exacting character of the work to live near the post-offices in the heart of our great cities, and because of high rents are obliged in some instances to live in crowded tenements, while struggling to bring up their families and educate their children in a respectable manner.

Mr. Chairman, this country is enjoying a great era of prosperity; the workingmen, the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, and the professional man are all doing well; property throughout this great land has increased in value and the country is growing richer each day. I ask that these men receive their just due, and that when this amendment is offered it may have the approval of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, we who believe that the use of tax-free alcohol, made undrinkable by denaturization, will work a vast change in the source of fuel, light, and power are charged with being fanciful in our hopes. But, Mr. Chairman, I submit we are no more fanciful in our hopes than the Congress is fanciful in its tenacious fealty to precedent.

Take our magnificent postal system, which has just been under discussion. Complete as the system is, it has some regulations which are as strange as they are old. A hundred years or so ago Postmaster-General Meigs, the good old soul, ruled books out of the mail because the sharp corners rubbed the addresses off of envelopes. It is a tribute to our spirit of progress that this provision does not survive. Along about the same time, however, the 80-rod provision got into the system. This regulation provided that where a new post-office was created within 80 rods of the established route the stagecoach should not charge anything extra for making the detour and delivering the mail thereto. Long ago the stagecoach passed. The railroad has come, but we still cling fondly, affectionately, to that 80-rod provision, and while the locomotive can not make the detour we make the railroads deliver the mail when the post-office is within 80 rods of the station, while we deliver it ourselves if the post-office is 85 rods away. Apparently the provision is as firmly fixed with us as the "M" in our coat lapels, originally put there as a sign of recognition by a French Revolution society; as firmly fixed as the two buttons on the back of our coats, put there four or five hundred years ago to hold up sword belts.

Akin to this has been the national attitude toward undrinkable alcohol. The internal-revenue tax on drinkable alcohol is levied by all civilized governments, but we are the one great nation left which continues to tax that alcohol which is not drinkable. Some of us believe that if the tax is taken off the undrinkable alcohol it will work eventually a revolution in the field of fuel, power, and illuminants. We believe this will be accomplished partially through known methods, but that the greater development will come through as yet undiscovered methods.

For there is no industrial avenue closed to the open sesame of American genius. By known methods the same volume of alcohol burns nearly twice as long as kerosene and gives a far better light; it is a cleaner and better fuel than gasoline. By the methods that are to come, I believe it will advance far beyond its present superiority.

INDUSTRIAL ALCOHOL IN LEASH.

Why? Because this country, the chief producer of corn, the best source of alcohol, has for nearly fifty years held burnable alcohol in leash. In those fifty years all other chemical products and fuels and illuminants have been free. Burnable alcohol, for industrial use, has been held back. Release it, and it will open the door to a chamber of marvels; not in a day, to be sure, but certainly as its use gradually develops.

We who are fanciful can not forget the story of the past. About the time that good old General Meigs was ruling books out of the mail, there passed through the city of Washington, in a stage coach, a man and a woman who were to revolutionize, between them, one of the products of the world. One was the widow of General Greene of the Revolution; the other an ingenious young Yankee from Massachusetts, Eli Whitney by name. Whitney had secured a place as private tutor in a family in Savannah.

Mr. HIGGINS. Give Connecticut credit. Whitney was from Connecticut.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is right. He did belong to Connecticut. Mrs. Greene was returning to her home in that city. When they reached Savannah, the two had become acquainted. Eli found that another man had his job. He was in a strange city without money. Mrs. Greene asked him to be her guest until he found work. While he was waiting, Eli one day saw Mrs. Greene working some embroidery on a tambour frame. This tambour frame was so constructed that it impaired and impeded the work. "I can fix that," said Eli, and he at once tinkered into shape a new tambour frame which obviated all difficulties. Out of that little tambour frame, Mr. Chairman, sprang all the prosperity of the South. For a few nights later Mrs. Greene gave a party. One of the gentlemen of the old South, when the conversation turned to cotton, said in lamentation, "The South produces but 5,000 bales of cotton a year. If there was some way in which we could get the cotton away from the seed cheaply, we would produce hundreds of thousands of bales, and we would all be prosperous."

Perhaps the company thought the gentleman fanciful. But not so the good Mrs. Green, for she said: "If you want a machine that will take the cotton from the seed, I've the Yankee boy upstairs who can make it for you. Why, see here, he made me this tambour frame." And she brought Eli down. He had never seen any raw cotton. Some one went to a warehouse and brought him a handful. And the next morning in the basement of the Green mansion he went to work and soon built the first cotton engine, which the darkies abbreviated to gin, the gin which makes the South's 13,000,000 bales possible to-day.

THE STORY OF GOODYEAR.

Nor can we who are fanciful forget Goodyear, who came out of a debtor's prison in Philadelphia to give the world vulcanized rubber. I think it was in Andrew Jackson's Administration that this country went crazy over rubber. Rubber companies capitalized to the amount of $5,000,000 were formed. Rubber boots, coats, and shawls were made. But the first ensuing summer was a hot one, and those boots and shawls melted. It was a common sight in those days, it is said, to see a man in the backyard burying his boots to get rid of the smell. Bankruptcy overwhelmed the rubber business. Meanwhile Goodyear, on Long Island, was working to discover a treatment which would make the rubber heat resisting. He found it, but no one would listen to him. They had enough of rubber. Goodyear made an individual campaign in favor of his discovery. He dressed in rubber and paraded the streets of New York. Once a man from Boston visited New York to see Goodyear, and asked the hotel clerk how he could find him. "Go out on the street," the clerk replied, "and when you meet a man wearing rubber breeches, a rubber coat, a rubber hat, and a rubber shirt, and carrying a rubber purse without a blessed penny in it, that's Goodyear."

But Goodyear finally won, and our immense rubber production is the result.

We who are fanciful believe that denatured alcohol, with known inventions, will gradually take its place in the market with other illuminants and fuels, and with inventions that are to come, that it may ultimately dominate many portions of the market.

FOUR KINDS OF ALCOHOL.

There are four kinds of alcohol to which I desire to call your attention.

The first is ethyl alcohol, made principally from grain. This is the drinkable alcohol. From 1896 to 1905 the cost of making it from corn varied from 9 cents for 190 proof to 19 cents, this variation being because of the price of corn. There are two common measures of ethyl alcohol—one the proof gallon, which is 50 per cent alcohol, 50 per cent water; the other the 190 proof gallon, which is practically pure alcohol. The latter is that used for light and fuel. This Government places a tax of $1.10 on each proof gallon and $2.09 on each 190 proof gallon. No one proposes to take this tax off drinkable alcohol, or to disturb it.

The second is methyl alcohol, or wood alcohol. It is made from the smoke and fumes of charcoal, and is a by-product of that article together with acetate of lime. It costs to make it about 39 cents a gallon. It sells from 60 cents to $1.50, according to the degree to which it has been refined. It is now brought to a very high state, and has largely supplanted grain alcohol in manufacture. It is a poison. It is not taxed.

The third is denatured alcohol. This is a mixture of grain alcohol and wood alcohol, used extensively in many lines in other countries, but not in the United States. The usual mixture is 10 to 15 parts of wood alcohol, the denaturant, to 100 parts of grain alcohol. It is poison.

The fourth is mineralized denatured alcohol. This is a mixture of grain alcohol, wood alcohol, pyridine (a coal-tar product), and green malachite, and is used in France and other countries as fuel and illuminant. The mixture in France is 2 parts of wood alcohol, one-half part of pyridine, to 100 parts of ethyl alcohol, with a small part of malachite added. The wood alcohol poisons the ethyl alcohol, the pyridine makes it noxious so that it would vomit anyone who should drink it, and the malachite colors it green to prevent anyone taking it by mistake.

In Germany, Sweden, France, Italy, England, and Russia, and Belgium, in Chili, Brazil, Venezuela, Mexico, in fact in nearly every nation except the United States, there is no tax on denatured alcohol.

The proposition before the Congress is to take the tax off alcohol which has been denatured and thus rendered unfit for drinking or for use in liquid medicines. Extensive hearings on the subject have been given by the Ways and Means Committee, and that committee has prepared a bill and introduced it. I hope it will pass this body and the Senate this session.

PRICE OF CORN AND ALCOHOL.
